WHAT WE THINK

Her place, not mine!

Used as we are to reading absurd nonsense in the mainstream press, even we had to shake our heads over the contents of an Evening Standard piece about the response of ordinary people to the Kosovar Albanian Muslim 'refugees' pouring into Southern England.

Writing on 7th April, one Zoe Williams described the resentment and fear which the influx has produced as "in pockets, inhuman." Turning a blind eye to the shocking record for shoplifting, abusing women in the street and handbag-snatching which some Moslem 'refugees' from the Balkans have already established, Miss Williams attributes the growing hostility shown to them by many people to the fact that they do not look hungry or badly dressed, and that, unlike when this country took in refugees and housed evacuees during the Second World War, we are not being bombed ourselves. As a result, twitters Miss Williams, "there is consequently no sense of urgency, no need to take comfort from notions of community and 'common burden'."

Acknowledging that Kent County Council

"simply does not have the resources to scoop up the refugees and deal with them quietly," Zoe then submits her entry for the Birdbrained Journalist of the Year Competition:-

"The burden will have to be spread from that community to areas beyond. If the incoming refugees are going to be as numerous as seems likely, some of us will have to accommodate them — not by giving £10 to Oxfam, but by giving up our sofa to an Albanian for what looks to be an indefinite period."

What can you do with such people?

Credit where credit's due

It is quite rare for this column to quote with approval something from the Jewish Chronicle, but credit must be given where it's due. According to the J.C. of 9th April, a Mill Hill minister, Rabbi Yitzchak Schochet, used his Passover sermon to criticise what he called "the Holocaust-obsessed" generation, and to suggest that money would be better spent on Jewish education.

Rabbi Schochet said that, for many, the Holocaust had become "a fixation ... central to their whole Jewish identity. But how can such a devastating experience infuse enthusiasm and vitality?"

"We must temper our obsession with the past and concentrate more on the present," he declared. "Over a billion dollars has been spent on Holocaust museums while the living are quietly exiting the stage of Jewish history."

It would be better, the Rabbi concluded, to spend the money on education and sending young Jews to Israel. With the proviso that where the money comes from the long-suffering taxpayer it should be used for the benefit of all the children of this country, and not just for a tiny minority, we can only agree.

Furthermore, we also concur with the Rabbi's assessment of the Holocaust as a dangerous fixation. It is, of course, for Jews to judge whether he is right in suggesting that the constant harping on about persecution — real or imagined makes no difference in psychological terms — undermines the enthusiasm and vitality of their community. And, similarly, it is for us to assess whether the endless propaganda about how our wicked, blond, racist German cousins did such terrible things, and how we didn't do enough to stop them, is harmful to the self-esteem of our children.

This magazine believes that it is. What is aptly described as 'the Auschwitz club' has been used ruthlessly to beat anyone who even dares to suggest that it is the job of the governments of the West — ours included — to look after their own people before they worry about the problems of others. Such sentiments, we are told, are 'racist', and racism, we are told daily by the mass media, leads to gas chambers and genocide.

Where the undoubted persecution of East European Jewry by the Nazis and local anti-communists did actually lead is a matter of historical debate, but the question is increasingly academic. As the clock ticks away to the year 2000 we are about to enter a time when the whole terrible history of World War Two can be discounted from politics in two short sentences:

"Those events were in far-off places in the first half of the last century; what on earth have they got to do with Britain in the new Millennium? More than fifty million people died during the Second World War, so even if six million of them were Jews, why should we have to suffer a genocide of our own by losing our homeland and identity to mass non-white immigration?"

Blood versus Gold

One of the most interesting things in Britain's newspapers last month was the complete absence of reports of an interview given by the Supreme Commander of the NATO war-machine, General Wesley Clark, at the very end of March.

According to reports on American TV, including CNN, and in the New York Times, Gen. Clark told a major press conference:-

"Let's not forget what the origin of the problem is. There is no place in modern Europe for ethnically pure states. That's a 19th century idea and we are trying to transition (sic) into the 21st century, and we are going to do it with multi-ethnic states."

Apart from showing that the man who decides which ancient Serbian city to flatten next has a grasp of the English language on a par with his knowledge of history and human nature, this quote also tells us what is really behind the Clinton/Blair war on the tiny nation which has been Europe's most southerly bulwark against Islam for centuries.

NATO target. Defiant young Serbs have occupied bridges in an attempt to prevent 'our' bombers destroying them

The Serbs' real crime isn't the harshness with which they have expelled so many of the Albanian Muslims who — having become the majority in the Kosovan heart of Serbia by a mixture of immigration, a high birthrate, and low-level ethnic cleansing of the native Serbs — have been giving aid and support to the drug-running terrorists of the KLA.

No! The real crime in the eyes of the powerful advocates of a multiracial New World Order is for any people to demand the right to preserve their own identity and freedom in the land which they inherited from their forefathers, and which they hold in trust for their unborn descendants. That is what is really the issue in Kosovo.

Today they bomb Serbia, in a few years time it could be France, Austria or Australia. One day it could be Britain. The bullying of Serbia is just another battle in the final war between Blood and Gold, a war which started when Boris Yeltsin sent in the tanks to silence the nationalists and left-patriots in the Russian Parliament.

It will be a long war. And, whatever happens in the Balkans, it will only end when Clinton, Blair and Wesley Clark stand in the dock in an International War Crimes trial. Their attempted genocide in Serbia will be one of the charges, but there will be others. Nuremberg rules will apply.

Smashing up Britain

Whatever major policy is on the globalists' hidden agenda, we can be sure that we'll find the BBC preparing the way for it in advance. So it is with the breaking up of the United Kingdom into smaller units so as to make it more easily controlled from the European Headquarters of the New World Order in Brussels.

The latest development in this direction is

These changes should cause us no surprise. For some time now, we have noticed broadcasters using the terms 'England' or 'English' where previously they spoke of 'Britain' and 'British'. All that has now happened is that they have come into the open and admitted officially what they have long been saying and doing unofficially.

In defence of this latest 'newspeak', BBC Director of Broadcasting Mark Thompson wrote an explanatory letter to The Daily Telegraph, which appeared on the 8th April, saying that...

"Devolution is taking us, as many commentators have observed, into uncharted waters. Concepts of Britishness and nationhood are becoming harder to define to everyone's satisfaction. The new guidelines merely emphasise the fact that the inaccurate use of some words can cause offence. Our concern is for accuracy and common sense, not for political correctness."

The giveaway phrase here is 'harder to define'. This is the standard phrase of those on the liberal left to apply to any institution, tradition or concept that has been targeted by them for demolition. Don't attack these things frontally, so the rule goes. Use phrases like 'harder to define' so as to sow the first seeds of doubt as to what they mean. Get people arguing as to their meaning, and the first step towards their liquidation is accomplished. So it is with 'Britain', 'the nation', 'patriotism' and other such things. Ideas and expressions which were once quite simple and definite then become blurred. People's preparedness to defend them becomes a matter of hesitancy once this happens.

Mr. Thompson would, of course, have us believe that his Corporation's policy merely reflects a trend towards change. Here is another trick of the politically correct: to the Beeb's announcement of its new politically correct vocabulary for words and expressions relating to nationhood. At a recent series of seminars news presenters were instructed that 'British' may no longer be used to describe "the generality of people living in the British Isles" because it might cause offence among the Scots and Welsh. Even in weather reports, announcers may not describe the weather as 'national' or occurring 'across the nation' because that may mean different things to different people according to whether 'national' or 'the nation' means Britain or one of its constituent parts.

argue that they are just mirroring a change rather than — as is actually the case — putting themselves in the vanguard of its promotion. The Director argues that the changes are a reaction to Devolution. But what is Devolution supposed to be (officially at least) other than a system of decentralised government? The Germans and the Americans have had decentralised government — in other words, devolved onto states — for a long time. Does that mean that their broadcasting authorities will be phasing out such expressions as 'German' or 'American' in future? We doubt it!

Meanwhile, certain politicians and journalists — whether through stupidity or something worse — seem to be doing their best to assist in the dismantlement of our country. Numerous articles have appeared recently in national newspapers, notably by Simon Heffer and Paul Johnson in the Daily Mail and Geoffrey Wheatcroft in the Sunday Telegraph, telling everyone that the English should begin asserting their 'nationalism' in response to that of the Scots and Welsh. Such calls are of course music to the ears of Alex Salmond and Dafydd Wigley, who want to detach Scotland and Wales from the Kingdom and thus break it into pieces. No doubt also Gerry Adams would not find such language uncongenial.

Tory leader William Hague, just to get in on the act, came out recently with a proposed plan to stop Scots and Welsh MPs voting in the Commons on any bill of concern just to England when it comes to the third reading.

Hague no doubt has this in mind as a sop to English voters, seeing that at present the Tories do not have a single parliamentary seat in Scotland or Wales. With the Tories increasingly seeing England as their only constituency, they were described by Wheatcroft in his Sunday Telegraph article as being "tempted to become an English national party."

All of this, of course, amounts to petty point-scoring in the game of party politics. Given the new devolution rules, Hague's proposal to curtail the voting powers of Scots and Welsh MPs on English issues could seem to some people as reasonable. However, in all this what we should be focusing on is the bigger picture. The bigger picture is that of a globalist-inspired campaign to smash Britain up. Our concern should be to do nothing to assist this campaign and everything possible to stop it. We should not be indulging in petty arguments about the voting powers of MPs on this or that; we should be endeavouring to hold together the great nation under which we were able once to become a major world power, and alone under which we might become one again.

Given this priority, we should see English separatism as every bit as pernicious a tendency as Scots and Welsh separatism. The British National Party is appropriately named, for it may soon become the only party that desires the survival of Britain!

GOODBYE TO A GREAT FIGHTER

John Tyndall remembers JOHN PEACOCK, who died last month

TIMES of great hope and encouragement for our cause from the political standpoint have been sad for us in personal terms. In December we suddenly lost Dave Bruce, a great BNP stalwart in North London and Hertfordshire. Last month, John Peacock, former party Organiser for the East Midlands, died, aged 57, at his home in Leicester after an illness of several months.

We knew the chances for John were not good. After a meeting last September he felt unwell and visited a doctor. He was diagnosed as having a malignant brain tumor — a complete shock, as up to that time he had seemed full of vitality. Treatment was prescribed which reduced his discomfort and slowed down his decline, but the end was inevitable and it came in the evening of the 16th April when he passed away peacefully surrounded by family and friends.

Though no surprise to me in the circumstances, John's death was nevertheless the cause of great sorrow. He was not only a sterling campaigner for our party but in every way a great fellow and a true friend, liked and respected by everyone who knew him.

Patriot

John Peacock was born in Leicester in 1942 and lived there for the whole of his civilian life. He was a staunch patriot almost from the time he was old enough to have views about anything. Later he enlisted in the Army, where he served for nine years in the 4th Royal Anglian Leicestershire Regiment and then three years as a reservist. He often related how, after being away around the world serving his country, he was aghast when he returned to his home town and found how it had changed out of all recognition with the huge influx of immigrants, mainly Asians, who had settled there.

This determined John to take an interest in politics and to look for people who wanted to do something to change things. He found the National Front, and enlisted as a member just as that party was making big headway in Leicester, at one time (1976) coming very close to winning a council seat. John was then virtually an unknown among party members, with other people much more to the fore in his locality. But his commitment to the cause of nationalism was all the time increasing with experience and observation.

Over the winter of 1979/80 the NF became split wide apart, with many Midlands members taking part in the formation of the 'British Democratic Party', a short-lived splinter group based mainly in that part of the country. John was persuaded to go with them, which he did with the best of intentions.

But, being of independent mind, he did not take long to realise that he had been misled. Soon afterwards he came over to the BNP, and that was when he first came to my notice. Never one to do things by halves, he plunged himself into activity to promote our party during difficult times. Soon he became Leicester Organiser and, not long after that, Regional Organiser for the whole East Midlands.

For some years in the 1980s, John Peacock was the lynchpin of the BNP in his region. At one time, for a brief period, the party's East and West Midlands regional organisations were merged, and he became responsible for the party over the whole of the Midlands. Undaunted by the extra responsibility, he simply increased his active commitment even further. Later, with the West Midlands able to stand on its own feet again, the two regions were separated and John went back to being just East Midlands Organiser.

Perseverance

During the 1980s, nationalist support in the city of Leicester declined both at the polls and in terms of party membership, mainly due to 'white flight' from the city into the shires beyond. In his numerous stands in council elections John did not succeed in getting the size of vote that his efforts deserved. Never daunted by failure, he kept persevering. Recognising the limited rewards to be gained by campaigning in Leicester itself, he spread his activities and those of his followers over the whole region, and was instrumental in generating growth in both the county and in Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and Lincolnshire. Now BNP strength in the East Midlands, having once been concentrated in Leicester, is much more widely dispersed over the whole East Midlands region, and for this the pioneer work of John Peacock is largely responsible.

In the last few years, new domestic commitments compelled John to reduce the time given to party work. He still remained a tower of strength in his region by way of his inspiration and example. By now, however, new people had come into the party who had the ability and enthusiasm to share a lot of the burden that John had once borne almost single-handedly, so that the East Midlands BNP was no longer, as it had been, wholly dependent upon him.

In addition to his normal activities in Britain, John displayed a great interest in co-operation between nationalists across borders, and he played the main part in founding the Ring, which brought people of like minds in different countries together. He also organised and hosted a series of summer camps in the most picturesque parts of the East Midlands with the same purpose.

John Peacock, as a nationalist, was a true hundred-per-center. One had the impression that if life provided 48 hours a day to us instead of 24, John would have been found putting most of the extra hours to the service of the struggle to which his life was dedicated.

The man

I have given tribute to John's personal qualities as well as his tremendous commitment to his political beliefs, and a little more may be said here. As well as being a true and loyal comrade, he was an extremely likeable man: pleasant and polite of manner though of an inner steel underneath. On the platform he spoke mainly in a quiet style but could become roused when the occasion warranted. He was always interesting, and he never tired of reminding would-be wavering nationalists that through personal experience he knew that the BNP way forward was the only way.

When I visited him in the Autumn of last year, not long after his illness had been diagnosed, he was very positive in his attitude towards it. In all probability, he knew that his chances of survival were slim but he gave no hint of this to friends, always talking optimistically of the future. In the later stages, when his decline had become apparent, he faced his fate with a dignity and courage which made a tremendous impression on all who came into contact with him. When I spoke to him on the telephone, there was never a hint of gloom nor self-pity in his voice but always a great interest in what the party was doing. Even when he had become unable to take any further active part, his advice and counsel were always greatly valued.

Our deepest sympathies go out to John's two sons and two daughters, their mother Erica, and his step-daughter, who together looked after him lovingly in his last months.

HIGHLY SUSPICIOUS OUTRAGES

CUI BONO? Who gains? This is the question that we must apply to many an act of diabolism that has political undertones. Is it being committed by those to whom it is popularly attributed, though the act itself would seem to win them far more public opprobrium than kudos? Or is it carried out by people serving the very opposite cause to the one named in connection with it, with a view to the latter being discredited?

When we heard that a nail bomb had exploded in Brixton last month, the question above came immediately to mind. Though various theories about the culprits were tossed back and forth in the hours following, the most easily predictable one -- that they were 'racists' -- became the accepted line. This followed a telephone call to Scotland Yard in which Combat 18 was reported to have claimed responsibility. The call, interestingly enough, was traced to the Eltham area, where the killing of Stephen Lawrence took place back in 1993.

Cynical exploitation

It will be recalled that in an article last month John Tyndall spoke of the deliberate exploitation of the Lawrence murder by the political left to whip up an atmosphere of mindless hysteria against so-called 'racism'. Such hysteria could well be used to frighten voters who might be thinking of supporting the BNP in the coming Euro Elections.

It might equally provide a suitable climate in which the Government could push forward ever more draconian legislation against 'racists' (meaning, in this context, anyone who believes that white Britons have a right to preserve their own identity).

Given this scenario, the bomb explosion in Brixton would seem to have come at a highly convenient time for the operatives of the 'anti-racist' industry, who possibly are finding that their exploitation of the Lawrence murder is beginning to become subject to the law of diminishing returns.

Then, a few days later, another bomb exploded in East London's Brick Lane. Brick Lane is well known to be an area with a high concentration of ethnic minorities, mainly Asians. It is also known to have been, at one time, a centre of activity for the British National Party, and the party's name is still linked with the area even though changes in the population and police tactics mean that it has not been active there for some years. The Brick Lane explosion simply added to the aura of fishiness about the whole business. Many reports in the Sunday papers following brought the BNP into the discussion, though with one exception not suggesting that it was responsible.

The exception was in certain editions of The Mail on Sunday, where it was stated as likely that the BNP would be among those organisations claiming responsibility. Exactly what the BNP might have to gain by such a claim when it is shortly about to contest a major national election was not explained. Unless this disgusting allegation is withdrawn, this report will be referred to the Press Complaints Commission.

Generally though, press coverage of the two incidents was more subtle. That the BNP itself could be involved would, after all, be a rather far-fetched story -- not only being seen as such by the vast majority of the reading public but also liable to be exposed as nonsense by subsequent investigation. The subtle approach incorporated the frequent repetition of the term 'far right' in connection with the bombings, and then the extension of that description 'far right' to embrace the BNP. The party would thus, by a chain of association one link removed, be associated with acts of terror -- however great the party's abhorrence of terrorism and notwithstanding the fact that it is the only party of any significance in Britain to advocate the death penalty for terrorists.

Blame

Did Combat 18 set off the bombs? Or did its spokesmen merely think it clever to claim responsibility after someone else had done so? Or -- could it be that the person making the 'phone call from Eltham did not represent Combat 18 at all but wanted it to be landed with the blame? At the time of writing these words, much is yet unknown and more may be known when they come to be read. Combat 18 consists, in fact, of a crowd of sick morons who never were at any time associated with the BNP and who were in fact proscribed by the BNP several years ago. For a long time BNP leaders suspected that Combat 18 was being controlled and used by the forces of the State to carry out actions discrediting the BNP as well as to cause divisions in it by appealing to some of its less mature elements to desert the party.

Aftermath of the Brick Lane attack

This theory was proved to be correct by later exposures in ITV's World in Action programme and The Observer newspaper, which established that the then head of the group, Charlie Sargent, had in fact been in the employ of Scotland Yard's Special Branch, Britain's political police. Even with Sargent in prison, it is quite feasible that the State is still guiding or using the organisation it helped create.

Law-abiding

Some hint of how the Brixton and Brick Lane explosions are already being exploited in establishment circles was given in a leader in The Observer on the 25th April headed 'Time to target the loony right'. The leader conveniently lumped together under the umbrella description 'racists' people as far apart as the possible bombers and the much greater number of perfectly decent and law-abiding people who seek to use peaceful means to undo the disastrous multi-racial experiment and restore parts of Britain to its indigenous people. The article went on to say:-

"There is now a challenge to the police force, still smarting, and the domestic security forces. Security surveillance has typically focused on the political Left, and the Right is either indulged or its menace ignored. Those days are firmly over. The loonies, extremists and the violent now draw their inspiration from the Right. We should expect the security forces to be no less vigilant in their actions here as they used to be against the extremist Left."

And further on:-

"The construction of a genuinely multi-ethnic society is a long way off -- and getting there will require a national determination to change the many still-racist components of our culture: a determination which has so far been lacking. Perhaps, paradoxically, the result of the bombing campaign will be to speed this urgent national will."

Or perhaps not paradoxically at all! As said at the beginning of this article, Cui bono? Who gains?

TIME TO BURY THE BIG REFUGEE MYTH

Contrary to 'liberal' propaganda, says JOHN TYNDALL, Britain has not always benefited from waves of immigrants

IT IS 'Welcome Refugee' time again. With the woes suffered by the Kosovans in Yugoslavia — woes only compounded by the meddlesome intervention of Messrs. Clinton and Blair and their bombing operations — the 'compassion' industry is once more moving into top gear to condition the British public to yet another influx of people from overseas to add to the strain of our social service and housing problems, as if there were not enough already. Once again, we are being told that we must open our doors and lay out the mat of hospitality because the plight of the folk concerned leaves us with no alternative.

And, as always when the hand of officialdom is in our pockets, rationales have to be provided by reference to history. Obliging, Paul Johnson came forward with an article in the Daily Mail of the 10th April reminding us of the debt we owe to newcomers who have fled to Britain across the ages as fugitives from 'persecution'. Heading his piece 'Haven of Hope', Johnson went on to say that: "For centuries, Britain has been a sanctuary for desperate refugees like the Kosovars," and he went on to speak of how "people who came here with nothing have become pillars of the community."

Shaky thesis

The theme of Johnson's article was a familiar one: generally speaking, Britain's open-door policy towards the world's persecuted and homeless has been of benefit to ourselves as a nation, even if in some individual cases the reverse has been true. This has always been the classic 'liberal' overview of the waves of people from Continental Europe and beyond who have settled here.

Actually, the issue is much more complicated than Mr. Johnson makes it sound, and indeed much more debatable. The problem with any such debate, however, is that under present conditions liberals like him start with an enormous advantage. They can bring to bear all the arguments in their armoury, whilst their adversaries are handicapped at every turn by taboos, and even laws, which greatly inhibit what they are able to say. If they are mainstream journalists, the taboos are enough. Any observation on the history of immigration into Britain that brings the writer onto the dangerous terrain of arguing racial attributes and differences is liable to lose him his job. Whilst here I myself do not suffer that hazard, I am constrained to avoid what happened to me back in 1986, when for daring to write and publish opinions unflattering to certain ethnic groups I laid myself open to criminal prosecution! So you see, when it comes to examining the actual benefits to this country of it being a haven for the world's cast-offs we who would question these benefits must enter the contest with one hand tied behind our backs!

Conviction

Nonetheless, because of my conviction that people like Johnson must not be allowed to get away with it I must join battle with him as best I can.

Johnson says of the refugees from Kosovo: "Let them come. We will find room, as we have so often in the past for the homeless and the persecuted." He then goes on to say, as if in support: "... we British have warm and tender hearts."

Let's examine these two statements. Have we found room? With every wave of new people who come to these shores, space and resources in an already overcrowded country are put under fresh strain. The present Government is talking about concreting many thousands of acres of our diminishing countryside to build homes for four million people who are estimated as going to need them in the next decade or two. We all know — although it is not the 'done thing' to say so — that a large factor in causing this demand is the flight of British natives from the inner cities where they are finding life intolerable in close proximity to large numbers of immigrants and their descendants. Already, the Kosovan refugees who have come here have met with resentment in several neighbourhoods they have settled. In the numbers now anticipated, is it being alarmist to warn that the demand for new homes in yet more 'green-field' areas is likely to increase? Just where is the limit? Just how much further does the process have to go before we decide that the 'room' of which Mr. Johnson speaks has been filled up?

Balance needed

But Mr. Johnson says: "... we British have warm and tender hearts." Now we're getting close to the nub of the issue! Warm and tender heartedness may indeed be a fine thing — in the right place and balanced by a calm and rational estimate of what is possible and — still more to the point — what is in our own interest. But warm and tender hearts are no substitute for space and resources that are finite in a country like Britain, where land is in short supply in relation to the size of the population.

Neither are they a substitute for a level-headed policy determined by the question of what kind of a nation we want to be in the future, from what kind of stocks do we want our coming generations to be bred. Not least, are we going to allow warm and tender hearts to blind us to the possibility that by importing large numbers of Albanians from Kosovo we may be importing into this green and pleasant land the very problems that have caused the horrific strife that we are now witnessing in that corner of Yugoslavia?

We need to bring rather more than warm and tender hearts to vital questions affecting our future as a nation; we need, above all, to think with cool heads. Paul Johnson is known to be a highly emotional writer. This is what

"Warn and tender hearts are no substitute for space and resources that are finite in a country like Britain, where land is in short supply" gives his literary effusions an often enjoyable flavour even when, as happens frequently, he is talking twaddle. Warm and tender hearts are emotional impulses. But emotion is no basis on which to make imperative national decisions. If generations hence have reason to curse us for impulsive actions today which land them with appalling problems in their time, it will be no answer to their reproaches to say that these actions were inspired by "warm and tender hearts."

But Paul Johnson, as is habitual with his kind, is determined somehow to find a way of reconciling what our hearts dictate with what is actually good for us. Hence the 'general benefit' argument. After speaking of Britain's 'warm and tender-hearted' open-door policy, he says:-

"And why not? We are a mixed race, a cocktail formed by countless waves of migration and invasions in the distant past — Celts and Welsh, Picts and Ancient Britons, Scots and Beaker folk, Jutes, Angles, Saxons, Danes, Normans, French and Flemings."

This really is not good enough. Virtually all of the mentioned migration and invasions were by peoples who simply constituted tribal branches from the same basic North European racial tree. Jutes, Angles, Saxons, Danes and Normans, in particular, were closely similar in almost every respect except language, where the latter group had adopted French but actually had their origins in the Scandinavian regions. The Celtic-speaking peoples, with older roots here, were of more complex origins, but a large portion of them had physical characteristics not unlike the Germanic and Nordic peoples, with perhaps a higher incidence of red hair. Some, such as the Picts, displayed a darker colouring. The point is that these groups, over many centuries, gradually merged into each other to produce a common British type in which light-hued features, hair and eyes predominated. Bearing in mind that all the larger European national groups have some diversity of origins, the population of Britain up till the second half of the 20th century was perhaps the most homogeneous of any of them.

Johnson mentions the Flemings, who came here much later than the other named groups, and he goes on to speak of "Dutch refugees in London." Again, he is referring to variations of the same North European type. One only has to travel to Holland or Flanders today to see the similarity between the people there and the majority in Britain.

To back up the position he is determined to adopt, Johnson refers in his article to the opinions of Daniel Defoe (1660-1731), author of Robinson Crusoe. According to Defoe in a piece of doggerel entitled The True-Born Englishman, the English "had nothing of which to be proud." They were the "barbarous offspring of the 'dregs of armies', an amphibious ill-born mob... the progeny of repeated invasions by innumerable people."

An earlier wave of refugees: Jewish children from Germany arriving in Britain in 1938

Which just goes to show that writers with Johnson's muddled thinking were around in the 17th and 18th centuries just as they are now! There is the same unsupported assumption that the "innumerable people" to whom Defoe referred were actually racially different. And who was Defoe anyway? Known as a radical iconoclast in his day, he delighted in, and made a very good living, putting his pen to whatever might momentarily 'provoke' and 'shock'. When it suited him from the pecuniary standpoint, he changed his allegiance from Whig to Tory, and was once described as having "the courage of his shifting convictions." Yet this writer is cited by Johnson as an authority on the origins of the English. Even Johnson himself describes him as "a weird immigrant of a kind."

So why does Johnson not refer us to other writers who might have something much more authoritative to say on the subject, such as Sir Arthur Keith, Roger Pearson, Raymond Cattell or Robert Gayre? These writers made a serious study of race and took trouble to research the facts concerning it, whereas Defoe was the kind of scribbler who came out with statements off the top of his head — and much more for entertainment than for enlightenment. The answer is of course that Defoe's ravings much more suited the Johnson case than the informed witness of the others.

Further on his article Johnson praises the Huguenots, who came here following persecutions of Protestants in France in the 16th and 17th centuries, saying of them: "France's loss was our gain: two generations later, families of Huguenot descent were foremost in the Industrial Revolution which made Britain the world's leading manufacturing and commercial power."

But who and what were the Huguenots? Looking at their descendants today, can we see anything in them that is different from ourselves? The vast majority of Huguenot-descended people look just like Anglo-Saxons, and only stand out as different by their names. They prospered and contributed admirably not only in this country but in Prussia, South Africa and elsewhere because they came mostly from the very best of French stock in pre-revolutionary times when the population of France generally was much more similar to Britain's than today. In as much as protestantism throughout Europe tended to follow a racial pattern, with its greatest strongholds in Britain, North Germany, Holland and Scandinavia, it is consistent with this that those families which opted for the new religion in France would tend to be the least Latinised.

Then Johnson speaks of the Scots and the

Irish, of whom he says of the former that they were...

"... at the heart of the Industrial Revolution and the expansion of empire, as engineers, railwaymen, ships officers and navigators, scientists, technologists and enterprisers."

Then of the Irish, he said that they began as the poorest but...

"... slowly established themselves and prospered, building hundreds of magnificent churches, fine schools and colleges, providing countless doctors, teachers and scientists."

But again, of whom is Johnson talking? Peoples indigenous to the British Isles who, before that, originated mostly from Northern Europe, being descended from various Celtic tribes and later receiving quite heavy infusions of Saxon genes from northbound and westbound internal migrations.

So what do we have so far? Merely movements of population — virtually all descended from common stocks — first into the British Isles from North Western Europe and then later forward and backward across the British Isles themselves. Irish into England but also English into Ireland previously, as was often the case (my own father's family being one example); Scots into England but also English into Scotland (the Lowlands are littered with them — just examine the names in telephone directories); Welsh into England but also English into Wales; Irish into Scotland but also Scots into Ireland. Do these migrations make the slightest sense of Irish, Scottish, Welsh or indeed English 'nationalism'? And do they sound like migrations which can remotely be compared, in respect of population changes, with those later ones from Asia, the West Indies, the Middle East or much more distant regions of Europe?

Highlighting the best, ignoring the worst

It will be noted that Johnson, in speaking of these migrations, has highlighted the success stories resulting from them, and referred to the positive and valuable contributions to English (later British) life made by those coming from elsewhere. But this is a misleading line of argument. Out of many thousands coming just to London, for instance, from other parts of the British Isles or Europe, it would be strange if there were not among them a few of ability and industry who were able to do well for themselves and indeed contribute works of value. The proper way to estimate the worth of these migratory peoples is to weigh up the positive and the negative, the high achiever at one end of the scale and the feckless and the criminal at the other, together with the mass in the middle who just constitute the legions of the ordinary and mediocre. There just is no way, statistically speaking, to make accurate estimates, on the available data, of final profit and loss.

We therefore have to make a sweeping generalisation, and that generalisation has to be that peoples from various parts of the British Isles have been able to blend into our population, as have also other Europeans like Huguenots, Flemish and Dutch — leaving a legacy generations on where only surnames provide a clue as to distinctiveness. We cannot know just by looking at the descendants of these peoples that they are in any way 'alien'. No doubt among them there have been some who have contributed positively, and others who have done so negatively, to British life. How these proportions compare with other stocks which have been here longer, we cannot know. We can, however, get some clue of their worth from a look at the scientific, technical, industrial and cultural achievements of the homelands from which they originated, and from the quality of life sustained in those homelands today. In contemporary Holland, Flanders and France there are today advanced civilisations and living standards high by most world comparisons. Therefore it is fair to say that, on a basis of probability, such people's achievement level in Britain is approximately similar to the average among the more anciently rooted population. The same can be said of people migrating up and down and across the British Isles.

But this is very different from attributing a special quality and value to immigrants just because they are immigrants, or to refugees just because they are refugees. Some immigrants and some refugees have enriched our gene pool, some have not. In estimating the overall benefit to Britain of these waves of newcomers, we have to assess each of them as a whole; pointing to isolated examples of ones who have done very well is no argument one way or the other. This is about as honest as assessing the nature of a landscape by reference just to its mountain peaks.

Success or value?

Then there is yet another consideration. In Mr. Johnson's estimation, the mere fact of an individual's success is taken as an indicator of his value. The two do not necessarily correlate. Here Johnson is especially anxious to give tribute to certain Jewish immigrants who did well for themselves in the sphere of high finance. They, he says, "helped to make the City (of London) the financial centre of the world..." Yes, but did that, in the long term, enhance the power of Britain's manufacturing

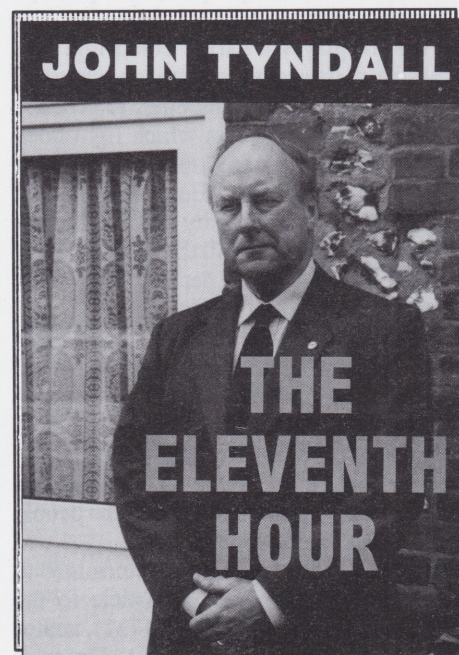

The Eleventh Hour now available!

THE NEW edition of John Tyndall's book The Eleventh Hour is now available.

As stated in our review in October, The Eleventh Hour has been regarded as the 'Bible' of the British National Party. First published in 1988, it has now been thoroughly updated to incorporate comments on new national and international developments of the past ten years. The book gives a comprehensive coverage of all the major current issues affecting Britain and explains the nationalist case in a way that has not been attempted in any post-war work. It is an absolute 'must' for anyone who wishes to understand what the BNP stands for and become informed about the life's work of its author.

The Eleventh Hour runs to 537 pages, excluding the index.

Price: hardback £25.00 plus £3.40 p&p; paperback £17.50 plus £2.75 p&p. Please make cheques out to Albion Press and send to PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

industry or the vitality of its agriculture? The same City is still today (just about) the financial centre of Europe, but the factories of our competitors on the Continent are still performing better than ours. The same City facilitates the takeover of what is left of British industry by foreign capital just as it encourages, simultaneously, the export of British capital from the terrain where it is most needed.

Johnson continues:-

"The London branch of the House of Rothschild skilfully enabled Britain to finance its long wars against Napoleon and pay the armies of its continental allies. Later the firm was foremost in financing the spread of empire."

That is one side of the coin. The other side is that this financing contributed to the steady rise in the National Debt and the increasing enslavement of Britain to the bankers. The argument presupposes that there was no alternative way to provide money for the enterprises mentioned. That takes us into a subject which really merits a separate study. Suffice to say here that International Finance aligned itself with British national and imperial interests just for as long as it suited it to do so. Once its centre of gravity became relocated in the United States those British interests became expendable, as they have been since.

Not an unmixed blessing

In the Thirties, Johnson claims...

"Hitler's race policies drove from Germany thousands of its ablest intellects, many of whom took refuge here.

"These included the great Sigmund Freud, who set up a replica of his Viennese consulting room in Hampstead, North London — you can still see it; his house is now a museum. Others became distinguished doctors, academics, scientists, artists and writers."

Just so. But before we decide that the presence of these people in Britain has been an unmixed blessing we should know more about them. Take Freud for a start. Is Johnson actually claiming that the theory linking the sexual motive to virtually every form of human activity has added to our enlightenment? And where the others are concerned we must ask: which doctors, academics, scientists, artists and writers? Have the academics all done services to learning? Have the writers all spread wisdom and goodness? Have the artists all produced works that have enriched our culture? These questions are, again, debatable. We would have to examine the contributions of each one individually to arrive at an accurate assessment, and then the assessment would be likely to be subjective — conditioned by our own ideological, moral and cultural attitudes.

Earlier, Johnson had referred to Karl Marx, whom he called a 'troublemaker'. Precisely! And could there not have been a good few other troublemakers? After all, why do refugees become refugees in the first place? In more ancient times they included many who, like the Huguenots, were fleeing from the tyranny of religious superstition and dogma. But that is to oversimplify. Refugees at all times in history also include people who have been kicked out of particular countries because there has been very good reason to kick them out. They are far from all being saints! Among them are subversives, seditionists, insurrectionists, incendiaries, rabble-rousers, traitors and just plain criminals of every type. If we are to congratulate ourselves on our good fortune in accommodating doctors and scientists of note, we should also remind ourselves that our open-door policy towards the world's 'oppressed' bequeathed to us people like Jack Spot, Sidney Stanley, Joe 'Lord' Kagan and Robert Maxwell (no doubt a case of one of Mr. Johnson's immigrant boys making good!). The countries that are glad to get rid of such breeds may well, with good reason, laugh at our stupidity at taking them in.

Observation

This is not — I hasten to assure the police censors who right now will be studying my words — a 'racial' observation; it is an observation about particular human types who may belong to any race, types who are a menace to society wherever they go. When we assess the value of 'refugees', we should also be taking these types into account. In such an assessment, the "warm and tender hearts" of which Mr. Johnson spoke earlier may not be the most reliable guides as to suitability.

But of these considerations, Mr. Johnson seems blissfully unaware. Proceeding on to Caribbean immigrants, he speaks of the 'controversy' their presence has caused. But, he says,...

"... it has to be remembered that without these immigrants and their children and grandchildren the National Health Service and London Transport, to name only two vital institutions, would collapse."

To which one is tempted to answer: aren't they doing so anyway? But that would be an unfair line of argument. It would be far better to state that our health and transport services were perfectly capable of survival before the Caribbeans came over and that numerous other countries in Europe are able to maintain those same services rather well without relying on such people.

At the same time, while dwelling upon coloured immigrants' contributions to health and transport services it would also be only honest to acknowledge the contributions of certain other coloured immigrants to inner city rioting, mugging, rape and the drug trade. Of course, Whites have also been involved in all these loathsome pursuits. I only spotlight the coloured role to underline that immigration is not the simple unmixed boon to our country that writers like Paul Johnson would have us suppose.

The Albanians

Which brings us to the Albanians, of whom Mr. Johnson says that we will soon be seeing them "taking their place in our society." Here, it seems, we are back to "warm and tender hearts." Says he:-

"Looking at photos of these suffering children and their anxious, desperate parents, I find myself scanning their faces and asking: 'Will this one eventually be a doctor in our emergency wards? Will I see this one some day behind the counter in a snug, useful little shop?'"

Maybe so. But would it not be equally reasonable to ask the question: would such individuals eventually be found engaging in hooligan behaviour in Britain's streets, as some of them already have been? Or looting and pilfering, as some of them have been? Or would we be accommodating some of them in our already overcrowded jails, as indeed we now are?

This is not to make an overall racial assessment of Albanians, who no doubt comprise the good and the bad as does every ethnic group. It is only to take the discussion away from the level at which it is ruled by "warm and tender hearts" and onto one where cool minds and wise deliberation take over.

Prudent

We look at the sad faces of Kosovar children and we feel generous emotions stirring inside ourselves. But these are not the criteria upon which prudent decisions concerning the future of Britain need to be taken. Much more to the point are the following questions: (1) Are the available spaces and resources of the United Kingdom such that they can accommodate yet more waves of immigrant peoples without subjecting them to crippling strain? (2) Is it reasonable, in consequence of these things, to impose yet more burdens on the British taxpayers without even trying to gauge their opinions and consent? And, even more to the point: (3) Do Albanians as a people constitute a group which, taking into account their ethnic and cultural character, can be assimilated into the British population peacefully and beneficially?

Where Yugoslavia is concerned, the answer to the third question quite clearly is no. And we ought to consider that, perhaps, the Serbs know a little more about these people than we do — having lived in very close proximity to them, indeed among them, for a long time.

All this leads to the obvious solution to the problem, which is that ethnic Albanians now not wanted in Yugoslavia should be resettled in — Albania! But isn't this precisely what the Serbs have been trying to do all this while? That, however, is another story.

ANOTHER JOURNEY BY PLANE

STEVE CARTWRIGHT meets the American Friends of the BNP

GAZING OUT of the 'plane window as we flew high over the mighty Atlantic, I marvelled at the size of this tremendous expanse of water, and later pack ice, as we headed onwards to Goose Bay and Labrador.

On my way to the United States as the first official guest of the newly-formed American Friends of the BNP, I pondered on the great explorative and navigational achievements of European man. From the pre-Amerindian settlement of the so-called New World by prehistoric Caucasians such as Kennewick Man, through the stories of Welsh princes and Irish monks, to the Vikings who sailed to the land they called 'Vinland', Christopher Columbus and later explorers. All of them had crossed the Atlantic in somewhat less comfortable surroundings than I!

Enemies of free speech

On arrival in Detroit, I went through the necessary customs and immigration procedures. The close attention paid to my documents by a rather stern Oriental woman from the Immigration Service added to my worry that the enemies of free speech might have got wind of my trip, and that I might be packed straight home on the next available flight. Then again, perhaps it was just that a white face is such a rarity in Detroit! In any case, I was in due course sent on my way to my connecting flight to Washington D.C., where I was met by Mark Cotterill, founder and local organiser of the American Friends of the BNP.

Mark and I have been friends for many years and it was good to see my old comrade for the first time in more than half a decade. After a day's recuperating from my lengthy flights, Mark took me to meet more local BNP Friends, explaining the agenda and the formation of the group over a meal.

The American Friends of the BNP was set up in January of this year by expatriate Britons (Mark included) and a number of sympathetic American patriots, mostly of British lineage. It has long been acknowledged that such a group has enormous potential in the States and, after seeing the inroads that both the IRA/Sinn Fein and the clowns of the Scottish National Party have made there in recent years, our friends decided that it was now time to give decent Americans the opportunity to hear the British National Party message, and to contribute financially to future BNP campaigns, starting with the forthcoming European Election.

The inaugural meeting of the American Friends of the British National Party was therefore held on Saturday 20th March in Arlington, Virginia. Around 100 supporters first heard an address by Dr. Samuel Francis, nationally-syndicated columnist and leading member of the Council of Conservative Citizens.

A different sort of Conservative

Readers should not get the idea that the American Conservatives are in anyway similar to the limp-wristed, globalist degenerates who stalk the corridors of power in the UK. Their Stateside namesakes are very genuinely patriotic, outspoken opponents of immigration, multiculturalism and the New World Order.

Dr. Francis used to work for the conservative Washington Times, but they fired him after his writings on racial matters touched a raw nerve too many. Some of his best articles have been published in his book Revolution From The Middle, which he was gratified to learn is sold by the BNP's Freedom Books operation (details of this highly recommended book on page 24 — Ed.).

When it was my turn to speak, I started by giving the audience a brief sketch of the history of the BNP, before moving on to discuss our aims and policies, and the importance of the Euro-election campaign. Also covered were matters relating to the Ulster 'Peace' Process, the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Parliament.

Phony nationalism

A recurring theme in the questions and answers session which followed was the phony nationalism of the Scottish National Party. I explained that the SNP are in no way nationalist, and that their policies are nothing more than internationalism behind a scrap of tartan. Many eyes were opened by the revelation that Salmond's paper-patriots readily welcome non-whites and sexual perverts into their party. Another point which went home was the way in which the IRA/Sinn Fein conceal their Marxism and pro-black/anti-white views when collecting dollars off guillible Americans of Irish and Scots descent.

Mark Cotterill then held a very successful Dutch Auction collection, which raised more than $500 for our Euro-Fund. He said that he was very pleased with the attendance, and went on: "I'm surprised at how many attractive females attended the meeting; I guess they all came along to see what a real Scotsman looks like! If they keep turning up in such numbers, my wife won't let me come to meetings alone any more."

After an enjoyable social evening, where everyone agreed that the meeting had been a big success, I was able to snatch a few hours sleep before setting off to Baltimore, Maryland, where I addressed a local meeting of the National Alliance.

Heroes and ghettos

Then it was back for a few days in Washington D.C. Architecturally, this is an impressive city, with many echoes of European capitals. There are many monuments to the Founding Fathers, heroes of the Wars of Independence, the War between the States, and later conflicts. But just a few blocks away from such tourist sites, and the heart of the world's last surviving superpower, lies a sprawling Third world slum. The city is made up of huge black, Oriental and Latino ghettos; the vast majority of whites have long left, living in white flight suburbs and commuting daily back into D.C. The heart of the capital is a virtual ghost-town as night falls.

The next day we returned to D.C., where we attended a fund-raising dinner in honour of Representative David Duke, who is contesting a high-profile election for Congress in Louisiana. In a brief address, Mr. Duke spoke of how well the campaign is going, and received enthusiastic applause when he predicted a 'political earthquake' on polling day.

The following day, Mark Cotterill and I were invited by David Duke to the NBC television studios, where David was a guest on the prestigious 'Meet the Press' show. A vicious, self-hating, white liberal host immediately tore into him, branding him a 'hater' and an 'anti-Semite'. He took particular offence to a passage in Duke's book that claimed that the Talmud is more hateful than Mein Kampf. He went nearly apoplectic when Duke suggested that Bomber Command in WW2 was as guilty of mass murder as Timothy McVeigh, the Oklahoma bomber! Throughout all this, Duke remained totally calm, the consummate professional, much to the annoyance of the interviewer.

Campaign trail

Immediately afterwards, Mr. Duke addressed a host of cameras at a press conference, before flying off to another pressing engagement on the campaign trail.

I in turn headed for the offices of Liberty Lobby, the populist pressure group and publishers of the influential Spotlight (which recently carried a double-page spread on the BNP) and The Barnes Review. I also visited the offices of Resistance Records, the white resistance music outlet which will resume publication of its top quality magazine in July.

Finally, I headed north for New York and New Jersey, where I attended a further meeting-cum-social, discussing British and European issues with about 25 pro-BNP Americans. After a fortunately brief visit to 'Zoo City', as people of our persuasion aptly call New York, this brought my trip to an end on April 5th.

Everyone involved in the American Friends of the BNP was convinced that the whole operation had been a great success. A whole swathe of nationalists/patriots on the American East Coast have now heard our message at first hand, and will be watching — and in many cases helping — our progress even more enthusiastically than before. A big thanks to Mark Cotterill and our other American Friends.

A second cheque for $1,000 has just been received from the American Friends of the BNP. Spearhead subscribers living in the USA who are not yet in touch with the group can put this right by contacting The American Friends of the BNP, PO Box 1746, Falls Church, VA 22041-1746.

UK readers who are planning a holiday or business trip to the USA are also welcome to make contact before their departure, and to arrange to meet with our American Friends. Please note that a reference from a current BNP official will be required.

THE ESSENCE OF WHITE NATIONALISM

by FRANK MARTEL

AS WE move more and more into electoral politics, it is vital for us to remember and to teach what it is that makes us different from those we run against. We are not, and we must not be seen as, just another bunch of politicians ready to say or do anything to get elected; rather, we must be political leaders — men and women who remain true to our basic beliefs, and to our words and promises. The following essay outlines the essence of nationalist ideology, the ideas and beliefs which make us what we are.

White nationalism is a complete philosophy of life — a philosophy of sacrifice and service. We serve our Nation and sacrifice for our Race. Our chief enemy, now that communism has collapsed, is the capitalist philosophy of individual self-interest, which is divisive and corrupt by its very nature. It tells people that if they serve themselves, everything will work out in the end, and it does — for the rich capitalists, as they have all the cards in the game of individualism.

Alienation and poverty

The capitalist ideal is characterised by the sick slogan “Look out for Number One,” and its rotten fruits may be seen in the crime, degeneracy, alienation and poverty which are producing misery for millions of our people, while a small moneyed élite enjoy lives of sheltered luxury. A white nationalist, on the other hand, seeks to develop his or her individuality, not to be ‘above’ others but so as to be able to serve them, and to achieve great things for the benefit of the nation as a whole.

The white nationalist way of life is based upon three principles: commitment, honour and honesty. We are committed to our people, and it is this love of, and loyalty to, our own kind which gives life meaning. Our purpose is to protect the chain of life which extends from our ancestors in time immemorial to our descendants in time in infinity. It is our sacred duty to see to it that our line goes on unbroken, that our race survives and achieves greatness in all aspects of life; for that is the nature of our people — we seek excellence in all that we endeavour.

Honour is doing the right thing. We use our reason to discover the laws of nature and to live in harmony with them. A white nationalist does not exploit others for his own benefit, for our development over thousands of harsh years on the edge of the great ice sheet has instilled in our genes a strong tendency to co-operate, and that same group loyalty remains the key to success in the modern world as well.

Fortune and sacrifice

So we share good fortune with our racial kinsmen, and we are the first to shoulder the burden of sacrifice when it becomes necessary to do so. We come to the aid of any of our kind who needs help, regardless of personal risk. Thus we have the moral courage to live honourably, and the physical courage to risk an honourable death. It is this purity that gives us the strength to carry on against great odds, and to lead by example in difficult times. So it has always been among our folk, and this is the tradition we keep alive.

A white nationalist speaks honestly to other whites at all times. We do not dissemble to try to confuse the listener, we do not hide our beliefs. We speak directly and precisely, and our aim is to be understood, not misunderstood in the way chosen by the old politicians.

We are preaching not only a new spirit and way of life, but a new ideology. Racial Nationalism explains how the world works, what is wrong with the present way of doing things, and how to create a new, better nation. White nationalist ideology is founded upon three pillars: Racial Freedom, Social Justice and Noble Leadership.

By Racial Freedom, we mean that we are determined to create a white nation, in which we are free to develop a culture and a civilisation in harmony with our nature and according to our standards. In a white nation we will be free to be ourselves.

The first principle of Social Justice is that all work is honourable. In our nation, whites will do their own menial labour, and will be decently paid for it. Under no circumstances will we bring in non-white workers. We do not want, and will not have, coloured slaves or wage-slaves, for this eventually and inevitably leads to the destruction of Racial Freedom as well as Social Justice.

Our object is to create a unified white order, where the people live in an atmosphere of amity and co-operation. Such unity can only exist in the long term if society is based upon the principles of Social Justice. We will eliminate class-conflict, rewarding ability wherever it is found, and ensuring that an individual's worth to the nation is measured by many factors other than the narrow criterion of financial wealth which pertains at present. All our people will have work, and the dignity and financial security it bestows.

Freedom and responsibility

Moreover, we will share the power that controls our national wealth, wherever possible giving the worker greater freedom and responsibility in his daily economic life. Our system will be based on directed private enterprise, with a mixture of small entrepreneurs, family farms, workers co-operatives and, where necessary, conventionally-owned companies, working under the guidance of government.

Capitalism is the antithesis of private enterprise because it seeks monopoly. A tiny economic élite controls both the economic and political systems of most of the world, and declining interest in politics show that more and more people are coming to understand this. The Western 'democracies' are in fact plutocracies – systems run by the rich, for the rich, and to hell with everyone and everything else. People understand that they are being exploited by their so-called 'leaders', which is why fewer and fewer people participate in elections.

Capitalism is social injustice institutionalised; it is a divisive, not a unifying, force. And our people want to be united – they are tired of internal strife, and endless class conflict.

The need to heal

We need a system that promotes the noble leadership which will heal such divisions, rather than the present arrangement, which by its very nature ensures corruption. Our present governmental system is designed to maintain the status quo, to keep power in the hands of the wealthy élites. It is good only for the distribution of favours to the vested interests who buy political power through campaign contributions, old boy networking and sinecure directorships to retired politicians. This frustrates all attempts to act in the national interest. The political structures of today are a prescription for paralysis, and good leaders are not drawn to a system where they can achieve nothing of substance.

The explosive growth of Information Technology is creating a myriad of ways in which nationalist leaders can inform, ascertain and reflect the popular will of the nation – ways which will expose the old institutions of misrepresentation as the tools of a corrupt plutocracy.

Our leaders must have the power to act. They must be drawn from all classes, and rise according to talent rather than connections. Unlike capitalist leaders, whose object is to live better than their people, nationalist leaders live simply, and are the first to shoulder the burden of sacrifice. This is Noble Leadership.

How will we achieve the political revolution outlined here? The Establishment will do most of it for us! Nationalist movements are inherently democratic as they embody the real will of the people and express the heartfelt longings of the ordinary man and woman. This is why nationalist revolutions, unlike those of the Marxian left, frequently succeed without resort to violence.

One capitalist government after another turned over the reins of power to nationalists in the 1930s, and the same thing happened to one communist government after another in Eastern Europe in the early 1990s. The Eastern Europeans threw off the alien grip of the Soviets, and the Red Empire was wrenched apart by nationalist movements in the Baltic, Ukraine, Armenia and even Russia itself. The communist leaders lost faith in their corrupt and inept system, and so did not defend themselves from the masses; the same will happen to the leaders of multiracial capitalism. A new way, the way of white nationalism, will rise to replace both of these evil twins.

The people are not blind. They know that their incompetent governments cannot protect them on the streets, cannot save their children from drug dealers, nor even educate them properly. They know that millions go unemployed while capitalism continues to suck in huge numbers of immigrants to provide cheap labour. They know that the owners of big companies would rather relocate factories abroad than pay a living wage in Britain. They know that millions live in poverty, and that the Establishment doesn't care. Oh yes, it will give the poor welfare so that they are dependent on handouts, in order to buy off revolutionary unrest. But it will not give the poor work with a living wage, as that would make them self-sufficient, as well as the process conflicting with the cruel dogmas of globalism.

Handouts for the rich

And the middle class pays for this welfare to those made poor by the system, and it pays for the immensely greater welfare to the rich that comes in the form of tax-havens, loopholes and subsidies for their favourite projects. Ordinary working people know that they are being sucked dry by government spending which is completely out of control and which benefits neither them nor the nation. They know from bitter experience that nowadays both spouses must work to live at the same standard of living they had as children when only the fathers worked – all to support an evil system which they do not control and which exploits them without mercy.

Across the whole Western world the story is the same. Everywhere the tinder of frustration and anger is building up. The potential is developing for a political firestorm which will destroy the old political certainties and misplaced loyalties. Organised nationalism will provide the spark which sets politics ablaze. All we have to do is to get our message out so that the people understand what we – and their present rulers – are really about.

The fall of a tyranny: East Germans destroy secret police files as communism collapses

NICK GRIFFIN on the Euro-sceptic view of the relationship between the EU and the USA:

THEY'VE GOT IT ALL WRONG!

THE NATO air attacks and propaganda onslaught against Serbia have highlighted many interesting truths about the kind of Europe which our current political masters are designing for us.

Some are quite minor — for example, the claim in the Daily Mirror of 22nd April that the Serbs were holding Albanian Kosovan boys to use as 'blood banks' showed that they still believe that it is both sensible and necessary to produce the most outrageously absurd atrocity stories in order to persuade the public to support their latest adventure. Curiously enough, the Serbs were also the 'enemy' against whom allegations about impossible 'gas chambers' were first used, way back in 1916, but that's another story.

The only logical explanation for the latest wave of lies is that our rulers are aware that the actual facts of the situation in the Balkans do not provide justification for their aggression. Far more important, however, is the way in which the war has reaffirmed the massive influence of the United States over the economic, political and military policies of the countries of the European Union.

The war has highlighted NATO's role — under American direction — as the military arm of the European Union. At the same time, the current proposals to speed up the entry of Albania into both the EU and NATO have further confirmed the complementary nature and direction of both organisations.

Muddled thinking

What the conflict has also reaffirmed, however, is the confused and muddled thinking which lies at the heart of the anti-EU rhetoric of the current Conservative Party leadership, as well as anti-Brussels grouplets such as UKIP. This thinking is based upon the misconception that the EU is a protectionist, anti-American, anti-global free trade entity. We should be so lucky!

In a speech to business students in Fontainebleu outside Paris last year, for example, Tory leader William Hague based his opposition to further EU economic and political integration on the grounds that "the challenge for Europe is global free trade, flexible and competitive economies and, above all, widening the EU to include the former Soviet Union."

A few days later, moreover, the former Defence Secretary and possible future Tory leader Michael Portillo argued in a speech to the American Enterprise Institution that attempts to achieve European monetary union and a common European foreign policy were threats to the trans-Atlantic alliance, global security and international free trade.

Quite apart from the ludicrous idea that the EU could afford to finance the reconstruction of the utterly bankrupt shambles which stretches from the Finnish border to the Pacific Ocean (bearing in mind that the cost of turning around the former East Germany alone nearly broke the mighty economy of the Federal Republic), such comments must have provoked a few wry smiles on the faces of EU 'insiders', and a number of well-connected Americans.

Sponsored by the USA

For the emerging historical truths about the origins of the EU confirm it to have been sponsored all along with American money. It was developed from the very start as but a staging post in a wider international plan for global economic and political integration. Jean Monnet, for example, traditionally regarded as 'The Founding Father of Europe', was a long-time Wall Street financier, who established the fledgling EU at the behest and with the help of his friends in the US government and the international banking community.

In the same month that Hague and Portillo were making their shallow and juvenile speeches, US Deputy of State Strobe Talbott outlined the real value and function of the EU for Washington in the May 11th issue of Time magazine:-

"For us the bottom line is simple: a politically and economically united Europe will be better able to advance our common goals within the transatlantic community and (as) a partner in confronting challenges in all corners of an increasingly interdependent world."

Likewise, Talbott made clear, "... an economically open and united Europe will create a more attractive and promising environment for American trade and investment."

Just days before, on 4th May, an article in Newsweek had confirmed that US support for the EU was based upon the fact that "monetary union ushers in a brand new form of capitalism, one perfectly suited to an era of blurring national borders and fast-flowing capital. As Washington sees it, an integrated Europe could be a fabulous playground for America's world-class banks."

Echoes

At the Euro-Summit in Cardiff the following month, Foreign Secretary Robin Cook echoed such sentiments when arguing that financial investors from the US and Japan would desert the UK if it stayed out of EMU for too long. "The reality," he proclaimed, "is that there will be people in Tokyo, people in Dallas, making investment decisions in Europe."

As was envisaged right at its inception, therefore, the EU is very much a part of what author Daniel Yergin has described as 'The Age of Globality', where national barriers to international investment, and the ability of nations to control their own economies, are being dismantled in the face of an increasing number of massive global banking, insurance and industrial mergers.

In Yergin's view, the world is now beginning to see a future beyond globalisation — the world of 'globality'. As he wrote in Newsweek on May 18th, 'globality' is not so much a process as a condition, "a world economy in which traditional and familiar boundaries are being surmounted or made irrelevant."

This tendency has been epitomised by the example of Goldman Sachs, which in 1997 reported pre-tax profits of more than $3 billion. Over the past few years the firm has played the lead role in a string of global mergers. These have included the $13 billion privatisation of Deutsche Telekom AG, the largest initial public floatation ever; the $38 billion pairing of Daimler Benz and the Chrysler Group, the largest industrial merger ever; a $4 billion offering for China Telekom Ltd., the first privatisation deal in China, and a $4 billion bond issue by the government of South Korea, the largest sovereign debt deal in Asia.

Significantly and revealingly, the Chairman of Goldman Sachs International, Peter Sutherland, is both an ex-Director-General of the GATT world trade organisation, and a former European Union Commissioner. Clearly Mr. Sutherland wouldn't fall for the painfully naive criticism of the EU as 'protectionist' by the free-trade air-heads leading groups such as UKIP.

These ominous 'post-globalisation' developments, and the role of the European Union in facilitating them, were confirmed last year in a book entitled The Age of Insecurity, written by two Guardian journalists, Larry Elliot and Dan Atkinson. They outline the proposed Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI), the biggest ever international treaty on investment, a ferociously internationalist scheme which will give foreign companies unprecedented power over national governments, denying them the right to favour home-grown industry or to protect their citizens from exploitation or the pollute-for-profit mentality of the multinationals. Needless to say, the MAI is fully supported by the Blair government.

It should also be no surprise that another keen advocate of the MAI treaty is Sir Leon Brittan, the British government's temporarily unemployed European Trade Commissioner — a committed advocate both of federal Europe and global free trade.

Eurocrats for free trade

According to the International Herald Tribune of June 16th, 1998, Sir Leon is committed to creating a new round of global trade talks. To be known as the 'Millennium Round', this is an ambitious plan to advance both trade liberalisation between the US and EU, and efforts to allow China to join the World Trade Organisation, even before it takes previously specified trade liberalisation measures.

One trade official familiar with Brittan's strategy confirmed that one of the reasons he wants a big and comprehensive trade round is that agricultural reform is a bitter pill for European farmers (ours included) to swallow, so he hopes to conceal it in a wider range of issues in order to push it through.

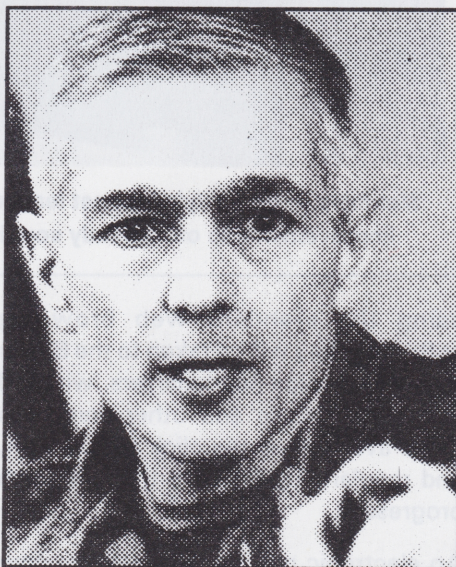

What we are seeing, therefore, can be summed up in the words of the authors of The Age of Insecurity:-

"International capital favours the controlled disintegration of existing nation-states into a much larger number of emasculated municipalities. Real power will be exercised by the executive organs of capital, such as the World Trade Organisation (WTO), the European Union, and whatever agency polices the proposed multilateral agreement on investment, the multi-national' charter."

Such chilling phrases as "the controlled disintegration of existing nation states" are given even greater resonance when examined alongside the words of internationalist functionaries such as Deputy Secretary of State Strobe Talbott. In his Time article, Talbott stated a prime aim of US policy with regard to encouraging European union as being to ensure "that the EU member states will find ways to bring a key European country, Turkey, more fully into that process. Turkey has been a presence and an influence in Europe for more than 400 years."

It gets worse as he goes on: "If the 'European-ness' of a village depends on whether its landmarks are church spires or minarets, then the peace of the Continent will be in recurring jeopardy of the kind we have seen in Bosnia over the past several years and in Kosovo over the past several months."

Gen. Clark: favours genocide for whites. Serbia is just the beginning of a new level of liberal internationalist tyranny

Another way of putting it is to note that the current American-led attacks on Serbia give an indication of Washington's determination to jeopardise the peace of Europe in order to prevent an independent country from affirming sovereignty over its territory and people under international law, including the United Nations Charter. Add to this the simultaneous talk of other non-European countries, such as Albania, being allowed to join the EU, and the big picture becomes more alarming still.

But the most frightening statement of all in this context was that uttered recently by NATO's Supreme Military Commander, General Wesley Clark, already noted elsewhere in this issue, but so revealing of the arrogance and hubris of the New World Order fanatics that it must be repeated again:-

"Let us not forget what the origin of the problem is. There is no place in modern Europe for ethnically pure states. That's a nineteenth century idea and we are trying to transition (sic) into the twenty first century, and we are going to do it with multi-ethnic states."

When such evidence is considered, it becomes obvious that the rationale behind the woolly Euro-scepticism of sections of the Tory party and UKIP is totally erroneous. The only thing which is uncertain is whether the likes of Hague and Portillo are deliberately creating a smokescreen, or whether they really just don't understand what is going on. It is difficult to know which would reflect on them the worse!

Euro-sceptics for Europe

Significantly, however, one supposedly 'Euro-sceptic' group, 'Business For Sterling', is supported by international business figures such as Lords Hanson, Younger and Wolfson, representing multinationals such as Unilver and Lonrho — concerns which have for many years participated actively in the development of the EU.

When the surface of this supposed 'opposition' is scratched, the real cause for their concern is revealed to be nothing more than a question of timing. As one of their leading lights, Lord Marsh, fretted recently: "If there is a collapse over the next two or three years and we are members, we will suffer more than any other country in Europe ... If the euro succeeds it would make better sense to join later."

Could it be, therefore, that in line with the predictions of global businessmen such as George Soros, many people and vested interests are beginning to feel slightly nervous about recent developments both within and without of the European Union? As The Times pointed out in an editorial as far back as May 2nd last year: "People are tired of sacrifice in the name of a single currency; if the launch of the euro does not bring relief, there could be a terrible backlash."

In his Fontainebleau speech to which I referred earlier, William Hague voiced the same concern when he noted that: "European elections are starting to show disturbing signs of the rise of extremism."

What Hague means when he talks of 'extremism', of course, is ordinary European people voting for nationalist parties. And he will learn over the coming months and years that more and more ordinary people, Britons included, will be voting in the same way as they recognise that Freedom, Security, Democracy and Identity are not 'extreme' demands at all, but basic human rights to which even white people are entitled.

1999: THE YEAR OF THE WEB

SPEARHEAD REPORTS ON THE ROLE OF THE INTERNET IN THE BNP'S EURO CAMPAIGN

1999 IS the year of the Internet. Even people with no knowledge of computers are hearing about the Internet several times a week. Dixons, Tesco, Virgin Megastores, WH Smiths, The Sun, The Daily Mail and the Daily Mirror, among many others, are handing out free Internet access to millions of ordinary Britons. Dixon's freeserve operation alone has gained a million users since its launch earlier this year. In addition, a variety of gadgets for linking ordinary television sets to the Internet are also beginning to make an impact in homes without PCs.

The British National Party was one of the first political organisations in this country to build its own Internet presence; thanks to the pioneering work of BNP Press Officer Mike Newland, we had a website before Labour or the Conservatives had even woken up and started taking notice of this revolutionary medium.

Within the last year, the party's Internet unit has expanded but, as reported briefly in last month's Spearhead, in order to rationalise this expansion, and make best use of our facilities during the vital European election campaign, the BNP held its first two-day Internet conference during March.

An enjoyable and stimulating weekend produced an agenda for action which will once again leave nationalism's opponents stranded, as the BNP builds on its earlier achievement in publishing what The Web magazine has already described as "some of the most extensive material to be found at any extremist home page in the world."

vote.bnp.net

At the centre of our new initiative is an Internet address (known in the jargon of cyberspace as a URL) which will be promoted in all of our election material: vote.bnp.net

Any voter with Internet access should easily remember this URL — even if they only see catch sight of it for a moment on a TV screen.

By typing this address into their computer,

Members of the party's Internet team during their two-day planning conference. Big improvements to our already sophisticated cyberspace operation are on the way using the standard web browsing software, they will be taken to the BNP's virtual campaign headquarters, with full manifesto details and other campaign news available at the click of a button, and regularly updated as the campaign progresses.

An electronic mailing list option is now available, so the new visitors will be able to register their interest and receive updates on our views and progress.

Many Internet users now have much more powerful computers and faster modem connections than when the BNP site was first created. This means that at this year's elections our site can feature a wide range of multimedia materials, including a video of the BNP election broadcast.

Remember the fuss in 1997 over the television broadcast — the pickets at the BBC, the cringing politically correct censorship of Channel Four? Well, this year even if you miss the broadcast, or the TV executives ban it, or Tony Blair bombs the BBC, you will still be able to see the video, and much more besides, via vote.bnp.net

Radio broadcasts, interviews with party candidates, and much other audio-visual material will also be on the site.

Publicity for the new site will also be stirred up through regular postings to political discussion groups on the Internet, known as Usenet newsgroups.

e-mail challenge

In recent weeks the various party pages have been attracting hundreds, on occasions even thousands, more hits per day, and our team have monitored frequent visits to the site from government departments, universities and the BBC. A glance at the website of Anti-Fascist Action provides an interesting contrast, as it includes a little box which shows how many hits they have had since February. This tells us that it takes AFA a month to get the visits which the BNP gets in a single day!

Messages of support, donations and offers of help have already begun to arrive via e-mail. One major challenge of the campaign will be to cope with the flood of electronic correspondence, on top of our regular postal enquiries.

Topics discussed at the Internet conference also included security aspects, some of which for obvious reasons will not be mentioned here.

What we can say is that all BNP internet operatives are now fully equipped and trained with the most advanced forms of encryption and computer security.

No doubt there will be lots more hysteria from the Home Office about paedophiles and terrorists, but we know that what worries the Establishment most about the Internet are the unrestricted propaganda opportunities it affords to the BNP — the only credible force challenging the politically correct mafia.

virtual bookshop

Thinking beyond the election, we will be taking full advantage of the commercial potential of the Internet, with a new site enabling our supporters around the country — in fact around the world — to buy the sort of books they can't get in W.H. Smiths, as well as magazines, CDs, video and audio cassettes, and other material.

One of the Internet's greatest advantages as a propaganda medium is its sheer flexibility. A well designed web site, containing vast amounts of material but easy to navigate, allows the BNP to present its ideas professionally both to the first time punter and to the experienced nationalist.

With the help of an accelerating technological revolution, we are going to push aside the old mass media 'gatekeepers', who used to stand between nationalist campaigners and the mass of the population. Just as new inventions have always changed the ways in which wars are fought, so the advent of the Information Age will revolutionise political activity. Over the next few years we will see the development of a whole new way of 'doing politics', and the British National Party will be in the forefront of this revolution.

The Information Superhighway is there for the driving, and as the improvements worked out at the conference are put into place, our opponents will only be able to watch in dismay as we accelerate away and leave them standing!

Dear Mr,

Thank you for your letter of 1 March enclosing one from your constituent Mr Mark Mathews of the British National Party, PO Box 1295, Bedworth, Warwickshire, CV12 0ZE about his concern over the contents of an article in the Daily Express of the 8 February.

The Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police tells me that one of the core objectives of the Racial and Violent Crime Task Force is to develop an integrated intelligence model to improve the response of the Metropolitan Police Service in the prevention and investigation of racial and violent crime.

I fully support the Metropolitan Police in the legitimate action that they are taking against racists. Clearly, no individual, or organisation has anything to fear from the actions of the police so long as they are acting within the law.

Yours ever,

Jack

JACK STRAW

After the alarmist report in the Daily Express of 8th February, 1999, in which Deputy Assistant Commissioner John Grieve was quoted as saying that he intended to 'close down' the BNP, a large number of party officials wrote to their local MPs asking whether they approved of the idea of using police harassment to suppress political dissent. A number of Members of Parliament, of all parties, replied to say that they believed that such actions would be unacceptable.

A particularly valuable reply was received by Mark Mathews, organiser of the Coventry branch, who wrote to John Maples MP, who in turn forwarded his letter to the Home Secretary, Jack Straw. The relevant part of Mr. Straw's letter of reply is reproduced here.

This makes it clear that the police intelligence-gathering operations mentioned in the Daily Express article are supposed to be used only to prevent racial violence (an aim which the BNP supports entirely, provided racial attacks against white people are treated as seriously as those against immigrants) and will have no impact whatsoever on the entirely legal and peaceful operations of the British National Party. Readers who are actively involved in the coming election campaign might find it useful to take a copy of this page and to carry it with them for the benefit of any over-officious police officer they might meet while on the stump.

NATURE AND POLITICS

IAN BUCKLEY TELLS US MORE ABOUT THE VIEWS OF NOVELIST HENRY WILLIAMSON

IMAGINATIVE WRITERS are often the best critics of a defective society. One thinks of Charles Dickens, or of Thomas Hardy, whose stories describe the lives wrecked by the money-worship, prudery and Old Testament harshness of the Victorian era. Hardy's works tend to be pessimistic and gloomy, for the simple reason that they diagnose but offer no cure. Henry Williamson, by contrast, was an author of quite another sort. All of his work was influenced by the great poet and mystic William Blake, who is the presiding spirit of the later novels. It was Blake who once pointed out that "what is now achieved was once only imagined," and Williamson's works took this idea further still: What is now imagined can one day be achieved.

Henry Williamson's grasp of the importance of imagination shines through in his remark in Unknown:-

"Of what importance was the world of matter, regarded in the light of dream and imagination — of the soul? I walked on, pondering in the sweet air, while a wren sang in a blackberry bramble ... I pondered what knowledge of these things had been lost with the civilisations that had passed; civilisations of whose existence we only know by a tile, a vase, a mummy. Have I been there all the time, in a hundred different forms, each one evolving higher to a godhead of perfection, to discarnate, timeless omnixistence?"

Williamson's political opinions — using that word diminishes him a little, for H.W. possessed a complete and holistic world-view — had been formed in the crucible of the trenches of Flanders, where he and many others had been converted to the 'soldiers' socialism'. Consider the following words from The Pathway, probably his greatest earlier work:-

"Another memory, of a little sparrow-legged boy dragged by his father over London Bridge, and trying to point at the seagulls soaring above the parapet. 'Aow, look at them birds!' A clout on the head, tears, dragged another fifty yards. 'Aow, look at 'em now!' A growl of 'Shurrup!' More tears, little feet trotting to keep up with father, and wet eyes raised from pavement to sky, and again, 'Aow, look at 'em now!' Another clout to the head, a thin arm jerking a wailing bundle of bones and clothes as though it were a puppet. Clatter of little feet on paving stones! He saw again the passionate face of a woman who ran upon the father with an umbrella, and almost struck him. With trembling cries she called him a brute, and looked around for a policeman.

"How was she to know that the man's digestion was ruined by semi-starvation, that his wife was ill at home, and that after two years' unemployment he had heard that morning at the Labour Exchange of a job, to which he was hurrying before the vacant place was filled by one out of hundreds given hope in the same way."

A similar message of how the humble man is chewed up and spat out by the System is given in an even earlier work than The Pathway, the short story The Mouse, written soon after Williamson had arrived in North Devon in 1921:-

"He were going in the Grubber (Devon dialect for the Workhouse — Ed.). It were a turrible disgrace. Man and boy he had paid his way, and now to end in the Grubber. His brain repeated dully the same thoughts: they were going to put him in the Grubber, they were. For this he had toiled and toiled at stone-cracking, bringing up children, tending his pig and tetti-garden through all the years; he had never spent his money at the Inn, as some had; he had paid Varmer his rent reg'lar since he were wed except a bit recently — and now they were taking him away to the Grubber."

The message is too direct, too uncomfortable, and H.W.'s ostracism by the Establishment has been correspondingly deep. Unlike Ezra Pound, who has provided dozens of academics with lucrative careers minutely examining the peripheral parts of his verse, Henry Williamson has never been the centre of academic interest. Examining the library at my old university, I only managed to discover eight of Henry's books, out of a total of 1.6 million volumes held in that massive pyramidal brick bunker. Librarians and lecturers alike — with a few honourable exceptions like Dr. Hugh Cecil — concur on the verdict: Just an 'animal author' with some peculiar ideas.

Henry saw all things as the sun sees

The natural beauty — and sometimes savagery — of the countryside provided Williamson with his best material over a long life of wonderfully creative writing them, without shadows, but our supposed intellectual leaders don't see anything at all, as they rehash second-rate commentaries on third-rate authors for their docile victims. The average academic, unfortunately, has very little mental curiosity, never questioning the status quo, even when the process of decline has accelerated to such a degree that his own office has to be secured by electronic locks and alarms. With their minds focused on meaningless abstractions, such people don't even notice the homeless (invariably our own young male countrymen, by the way) as they trip over them on their way around campus.

Radiant life

Only very few men are granted both the courage and ability to make a decisive stand in favour of more beautiful and radiant life, but such was the career of Henry Williamson. "The sun shone on them all ... until it seemed that the sun was shining through him to that ancient life again."

Without the transforming catastrophe of the First World War, none of this would have been possible. The shock to the system engendered by the war seems to have sent him along a different path to most, by awakening dormant faculties of ancestral memory:-

"He had never been so lonely as when he left to be demobilised, and had gone home to his village to brood on the bitter changes that the war had wrought; and, finding nothing left for him, had set out with a pack on his back, meaning never to return. Had he not, like Jefferies, entirely and utterly rejected civilisation — civilisation that was worse than barbarism — since it chained a man to slavery in its factories and towns and, as compensation, released him so he might mutilate or be mutilated in order to save that civilisation."

(The Dream of Fair Women)

Expressing thoughts like these, the once shy dreamer inevitably became politically involved during the 1930s, even to the extent of trying his hand as a pub agitator:-

"His line of talk, uttered during rare visits to the Horn and Crown and the Turnip Arms puzzled most listeners. He said that under the existing System an increase of soil-erosion was inevitable, with the pollution of rivers by sewage and the silting of estuaries; while the same System produced the piling up of unsold goods for export, with consequently increasing unemployment, leading to the inevitability of war. The golden tapeworm had enfeebled the body politic; only if all in Britain saw this, only if all worked for the idea of People and Soil, together with the Empire in service to the ideal of building a great new civilisation, could war with anti-Money resurgent nations, leading to the extinction of Europe, be avoided."

(The Phasian Bird)

In the final pages of The Phoenix Generation, which covered the last days before the British Government declared war on Germany, Williamson gives us a sustained and prolonged denunciation of the decadence he saw all around him. The subsequent years of British decline following the end of the war have since increased that physical-spiritual squalor to the *n*th degree:-

"They reached the area left ugly by the maulings of London: speculative hire-purchase housing 'estates' — all trees cut down — tens of thousands of cubic yards of coke breeze blocks and pink heaps of fletton bricks piled up. Life is big business, fornication and death. Civilisation is chromium fittings, radio, love with a pessary, rubber girdles, perms, BBC gentility and the sterilising of truth, cubic international-style concrete architecture. Civilisation is white sepulchral bread, gin and homosexual jokes in the Shaftesbury Avenue theatres. Civilisation is world-citizenship and freedom from tradition, based on rootless eternal wandering in the mind that had nothing to lose and everything to gain including the whole world. Hoardings, brittle houses, flashiness posing as beauty, mongrel living and cosmopolitan modernism, no planning, all higgledy-piggledy — thus the spiritual-material approaches to London; the great wen, Cobbett called it. Was the wen about to burst and pus run through the body politic for the second time in his life?"

Most often though, Henry Williamson preferred sharpness and brevity to the sustained rant. In A Solitary War he sees through all the endless wars of Tory 'patriots', from South Africa to Serbia, in a mere eleven words: "the minotaur of usury behind the mask of the British Lion."

For a man of Henry's acute sensibilities the Second World War came as a terrible, numbing disaster, the destruction of all he held dear. He thought, as he had long done, that life on his Norfolk farm was a microcosm of the European macrocosm, and that disaster and destruction awaited him in his personal life. In Lucifer Before Sunrise he described vividly his reaction — a feeling of physical empathy with the bombing victims — after the Allied bombing of the Renault works in Paris, which caused many civilian casualties. No doubt he felt much the same when he heard of the destruction of Coventry and the firestorms of Hamburg and Dresden.

A calmer old age

After the war, H.W. tended to take a longer, calmer view. Although, even in old age, he attended demonstrations against, for example, the Vietnam War, he was more often content just to work in his writer's hut at Ox's Cross on Exmoor, or to walk in the Branton Burrows, now partially destroyed by the American tanks that had exercised there during the war.

"He got up and wandered over wet pebbles, trying in vain to recall the end of Birkin's books, the one composed in prison during the war. He went back to her, 'Melissa, I used to know the peroration by heart, but now...'

'I remember it.'

'You do.'

She quoted: 'Great is it to live in this moment of Fate, because it means that this generation is summoned to greatness in the service of high purpose.'"

ETHNIC CLEANSING IN BELFAST

WHILE Tony Blair pushes for NATO and British soldiers to be sent to risk their lives to stop ethnic cleansing in Kosovo, he is all in favour of allowing serial ethnic cleansers to become part of the government in Northern Ireland.

The grim facts behind Labour's hypocrisy in all this are revealed by the photographs reproduced here. The scenes are absolutely typical in those parts of Belfast and other places in Ulster where loyalist homes which adjoin republican areas have come under repeated attacks for years — attacks which continue to this day, despite the farcical so-called 'Peace Process'.

The pictures were taken during a visit to the Province last month by BNP Director of Publicity Nick Griffin. Mr. Griffin spoke at a meeting of the Ulster BNP, held in an upmarket hotel venue in East Belfast. His speech, which gave a vision of what life in this country will be like ten years after the BNP is first elected, was enthusiastically received by an audience which included former members of the National Front and National Democrats, as well as more recent BNP recruits.

International audience

Among the ideas discussed in the question time which followed was the way in which the BNP's internet reach could be used to inform an international audience of the true, aggressive nature of the republican movement, whose leaders and followers are not primarily interested, as they claim, in getting rid of British troops, but in driving ordinary members of the majority community from their homes. Dozens of farmers along the border have been murdered for no other reason than that they were Protestants, and loyalist homes in Portadown in particular have been under nightly siege in recent weeks.

In order to get pictures for the cyberspace exposé on the reality of Sinn Fein/IRA's ethnic cleansing campaign in Belfast, the editor of the BNP broadsheet True Brit took the mainland visitor on a tour of some of the worst hit parts of Belfast.

More of these images, routinely ignored by the controlled mass media, may now be seen on the BNP's www.bnp.to multi-media website. This will not only help to spread the word about republican bigotry and New Labour hypocrisy, but it will also aid BNP recruitment in Northern Ireland, by showing potential supporters that the party can help them to launch an effective fightback against the lies of the hitherto virtually unchallenged republican propaganda machine.

Oldpark Road, North Belfast. A row of pensioners' bungalows lie burnt out and boarded up. In some areas, the communal violence is tit-for-tat, but what possible harm could a group of OAPs do to anyone? The authorities built these pensioners' homes on a line dividing the two communities on the assumption that, with no loyalist youngsters flying Union flags or playing in bands, the republican gangs would leave their neighbours alone. But Sinn Fein/IRA are not interested in peaceful co-existence, they want to force 'the enemy' out altogether — even old ladies!

Manor Street, just off the Crumlin Road. Here too, new houses have come under attack. This estate backs onto a republican area and, despite a massive 'peace line' fence, a combination of bricks and petrol bombs being hurled at the back of the houses, and incursions by rampaging gangs of Sinn Fein/IRA thugs, have forced the residents out. Protestant churches are also a favourite target, but this has very little to do with religion. Gerry Adams and his supporters may pose as the representatives of Northern Ireland's Catholics, but they are in fact all atheistic Marxists. Their aim remains a Socialist United Ireland, in which decent Catholics would be persecuted almost as much as any Protestants who dared to remain in their own country

HUGE BOOST TO CAMPAIGN

As we go to print, millions of British National Party Euro election addresses are also thundering off the presses! Fifteen million to be precise! Only a few months ago, the party's target was to distribute just four million leaflets during the campaign, but a combination of the BBC's own-goal in forcing us to fight so many extra seats to get TV airtime, the tremendous response to the BNP's Euro-Fund appeal, and the hard organisational work of so many local and regional officials has made it possible to do much more than was initially anticipated.

The election address, which has a full-colour front side, points out that a vote for the BNP is a vote to restore Britain's independence, and goes on to look at the way in which membership of the EU is destroying our freedom and democracy. It shows how UKIP's free trade policy is no alternative to the job insecurity created by European regulations and foreign competition. Also very topical is a reference to the fact that EU law denies the British government control over our own borders, one of the reasons for the continued influx of huge numbers of bogus asylum-seekers.

The election address concludes with a form on which readers can request more information "about the British National Party's campaign to 'Save Our Sterling' and to preserve the cultural and ethnic identity of the British people and the unity and freedom of the United Kingdom."

TRAINING SEMINARS

With all those enquiries on the way, work to improve the party's follow-up operation is of great importance. Many units have taken note of articles on this subject in Spearhead. South Birmingham organiser Lee Windridge, for example, has told us that he tried out the recommendation that every follow-up visit should be concluded by asking the new enquirer if he or she has any friends who think the same way and who might like to hear from the BNP. The first time he tried it, this simple request produced no fewer than four additional enquiries.

Two seminars dealing with how to make the most of the coming flood of enquiries took place last month. The first, organised by the recently formed North West London unit, included contributions from Nick Griffin, Mike Newland, Frank Forte and a professional sales trainer.

The second, held in the East Midlands, was a short but very effective presentation by the organiser of the BNP's Professional Development Team, Pete Baker.

Mr. Baker and his colleagues are planning to hold two further seminars on this subject over the weekend of 19th-20th June, one for activists from the South West and West Midlands, and one for the North of England and Scotland. This will give everyone a ten-day break after the election, and then provide the signal — and some extra expertise — to begin the biggest follow-up operation in the history of British nationalism. It is also hoped to produce a video on the subject for the benefit of units which are unable to get to any of the current round of seminars.

MEDIA-HANDLING

The party's national media-handling machine had a successful test-run for the Euros on the Monday after the Brick Lane bombing. Press officer Mike Newland submitted formal complaints to the Mail on Sunday and to several radio stations over their disgraceful attempts to link the party with the mayhem.

Professional Development Team organiser Pete Baker scored a string of direct hits in a verbal running battle with Radio Five Live commentator Nicky Campbell and his left-wing Asian guest, who described him as being part of "the BNP's charm offensive ... the friendly face of the BNP."

John Tyndall was interviewed on the Today programme on Radio Four, getting across the facts that the party stands, as it always has, for the death penalty for terrorism. His comment that C18 was set up by a State asset, and might even still be run by the security services was, intriguingly, not disputed by Home Secretary Jack Straw, who was interviewed on the programme immediately afterwards.

Phill Edwards, organiser of the Media Monitoring Unit, called up Steve Allen on LBC after a London activist had alerted him to several attacks on the party on his 'phone-in that morning. As well as making it clear that the BNP condemns such attacks and does not use violence itself, the BNP spokesman hammered home a variety of excellent points, including the fact that whites are fast becoming a minority in London, the way in which police worries about being branded 'racist' have cut stop-and-search measures and so led to a sharp increase in mugging, and a big plug for the party's Save Our Sterling stance and Euro election campaign.

All this goes to prove that it is no exaggeration when we say that the British National Party has developed the most sophisticated PR machine ever built by a nationalist organisation in Britain. Readers can help to ensure that this is used to its full advantage during the European election campaign by monitoring local radio stations and newspapers and reporting any anti-BNP bias to us at once on 0709 1000 658.

EURO-ELECTION FUND

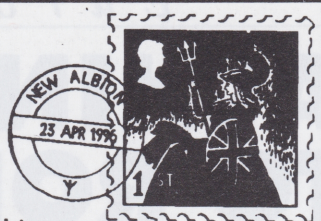

LAST BIG PUSH NEEDED — £69,779 NOW RAISED!

Fresh donations to the BNP's national Euro-election fund last month came to £10,520. This included $1,000 from our American Friends, large sums from Scotland and the North East, and £1,155 from the 180 Club. However, the double counting of one donation led to an over-statement of £1,000 last month, so the correct fresh figure is £69,779.

With the election taking place on June 10th, this is your last chance to help the BNP raise the last £10,221 needed to reach the all-important £80,000 target. The BNP is on course to bring this, the biggest appeal in its entire history, to a successful conclusion, but your help is needed if we are to be sure of doing so.

Please send the largest possible donation, payable to 'British National Party', c/o PO Box 117, Welling, Kent, DA16 3DW. In order to save on administration time and costs, donations below £10 will not be acknowledged unless accompanied by an SAE. Please act today to give the British people a real choice in June!

SIR: After several days of hysteria about the 'Nazi links' of the Denver school killers, the British media suddenly dropped the story. Could this change of policy be linked in some way to an Associated Press report which I have just read on the Internet?

It turns out that the so-called Trenchcoat Mafia, to which the crazed murderers belonged, is in fact a militant homosexual gang.

Furthermore, one of the two mass murderers, Dylan Klebold, was actually Jewish. His great-grandfather, Leo Yassenoff, was a wealthy property developer who left his $13 million fortune to charity.

I often read articles from Spearhead and other BNP publications on your websites. Your material is great, and I wish you all the best of luck in the forthcoming elections over there.

SIR: Robert Colby's proposal in last month's Spearhead that economic development grants should be made available to returning immigrants in addition to resettlement grants is to be welcomed.

If the party is to embrace a genuinely voluntary repatriation policy whilst maintaining a commitment to an overwhelmingly white Britain then clearly it has to provide adequate incentives to make this position credible.

Generous economic development grants paid to individual returners (rather than as overseas aid to host governments) look like a win/win solution. The returners benefit through the receipt of substantial capital funds to be invested in businesses of their own or to be available for the purchase of shares in existing companies within their own countries. The host countries benefit through the substantial injection of privately owned and managed enterprise capital into their economies. Britain benefits through resolving its race relations problem in a way that preserves the dignity of all those involved whilst simultaneously generating real opportunities for people and countries who need them most.

In terms of a political strategy Mr. Colby's proposal clearly has the potential to deliver ethnic minority votes to the BNP whilst also presenting a much more difficult target for the liberal media to hit. Most significantly, it represents a position that millions of ordinary Britons would feel comfortable voting for and standing up for.

SIR: I was deeply saddened to hear of the passing of John Peacock, the party's former East Midlands regional organiser. I am sure that you will provide him with a fitting obituary, but I would like to add a personal word to your tribute.

I knew John for nearly 15 years – not as long as some others, but in that time he had a big and always beneficial impact on my own life. He was always on hand to advise me during my novice years, and was the first to help us form our local branch.

I am sure that I speak for many people when I say that his well-known summer camps were always most enjoyable. John was always there when needed, and seldom required asking for his participation.

Such men come along very rarely, which makes his passing a sad blow indeed. John Peacock will be sorely missed, particularly here in the Midlands. He worked tirelessly for victory and we owe it to him, if nothing else, to strive to get maximum benefit from the Euro-election.

SIR: In his generally dull memoirs, Reflect on Things Past, top Tory and One Worlder Lord Carrington does make the following interesting comments:-

"My reputation for being anti-Israeli was strongly formented by the Israelis themselves. Both they and the Jewish lobbies in Britain and America tended to regard as an enemy anybody who accepted less than a hundred per cent of their view, anybody who saw another. Shamir, then Israeli Foreign Minister, and Prime Minister Begin continuously spread the word of how hostile I was.

I was wholly dedicated to Israel's right to exist ... Begin's obsessions with the crimes committed against his people were perfectly understandable, but in a statesman of international significance they should not have been allowed to induce something close to paranoia. I remembered how Begin, on a visit to England, had once lunched at 10 Downing Street, and turned to Margaret Thatcher:

'You are responsible for the death of two million Jews at Auschwitz!' Margaret looked somewhat astonished. I suppose she had been aged about thirteen at the time in question. 'You are responsible! Because you didn't bomb the railway line.'

Apart from remarking that Lord Carrington's dedication to the right of Israel to exist is in marked contrast to his beavering away to destroy British national existence in the European Union, one might ask whether some of our enemies are irredeemably evil, or simply hopelessly insane.

SIR: The Greek Orthodox Archbishop was interviewed briefly on Radio Four this morning, commenting on the bombing of Yugoslavia, a Christian country, during the most sacred week of Easter. He did not contrast this with our suspension of the bombing of Iraq during Ramadan.

How long before Cardinal Hume or Aechbishop Carey comment on the timing of the increased bombing?
Don't hold you breath!

SIR: The 'new South Africa' goes from bad to worse. Since the hand-over in 1994, some 600 (mostly white) farmers have been murdered. Without us, the urban millions would, of course, starve, but Mandela is at the time of writing being fawned upon in Scandinavia, where no-one has the guts to challenge him about this.

Our own farm staff, some of whose fathers and grandfather were employed here, remain very loyal, but one has to be constantly alert and suspicious of strangers. I strap on a firearm at sundown and, whenever we return home after dark we wait for the reflection of our Doberman's eyes in the headlights before activating the electronic gate to the yard.

As for the towns, once charming Pietermaritzburg, 40km from us, is now a squalid slum, with its streets used as latrines and prowled by muggers.

Please note this fact, which is of great importance: the books sold through Freedom Books are written by many different kinds of authors holding a number of different political viewpoints, very few of them being in any way connected with the British National Party. The party's Freedom Books operation distributes these books because it is felt that they fill important gaps in public information and understanding of vital national and international issues. This does not mean that all of what is printed in these books should necessarily be taken as representative of the policies of the British National Party. We reserve the right to differ with some of the authors on some parts of their writings.

The Full Monty. Exposes Tony Blair's unbelievable recommendation that skilled men thrown out of work by New Labour's Tory globalist economic policies should retrain as strippers! Even more arrogant than Norman Tebbit's infamous 'On your bike' comment, this disgusting suggestion has given the BNP a leaflet which can be used to devastating effect in Labour's old industrial heartlands.

Conservative? Not any more! Aimed especially at disillusioned Tory voters and activists, and particularly useful in the constituencies of Tory MPs who attack the BNP. Exposes the liberalism and perversion which riddles the Conservatives.

Stop the building! Calls for a halt to the planned destruction of the green-belt by up to five million new houses. Exposes immigration as the motor of the threat to our countryside.

The leaflets above are all two-coloured, double-sided and cost £8 per 1,000, with postage charges of £5.15 for 1,000 and £5.80 for 2,000.

Other publicity items in stock are the headline-grabbing A4 anti-paedophile leaflet, 'Stop Labour's attack on the welfare state', 'Defend British Fishermen' and British Countryman. Call 0374 454893 for details.

Regular leafletting is the key to increased recruitment. These are first class propaganda weapons, use them to build the British Resistance!

For the first time, the British National Party is taking advantage of the video revolution to bring its message into your drawing room!

This short film has been made in support of BNP candidates in the coming local government elections in East London. Some candidates and one ordinary voter are featured in the film talking about the important local issues on which the BNP will be fighting - issues which the Labour, Tory and LibDem parties prefer to ignore.

Also included in the film is the party election broadcast made by BNP leader John Tyndall, which was shown to the whole nation just before the general election of May 1997. If you missed this, now's your chance to see it!

Because some households in your ward will not have a video player, we are not putting a copy of this video into every home. If you don't have a player, please pass the video on to a neighbour you know who has. If you do have one, please still pass the video on after you have played it to your family. DEDICATION!

NORTH EAST

MONTHS OF hard work by North East regional organiser Chris Telford and a small but dedicated group of activists in Tyneside are beginning to pay off. The latest step forward was a very successful meeting held in South Shields on April 10th.

This was chaired by Mr. Telford, who gave a summary of local activities, and announced a schedule of future leafleting which is intended to distribute 25,000 in the next month. He then introduced the first of the two guest speakers, North West regional organiser Chris Jackson.

Mr. Jackson gave an inspiring address on the potential benefits of the forthcoming Euro campaign, before going on to explain the need for this to be followed by a real effort to integrate new members and supporters into our own economic, social and cultural alternatives to aspects of the existing system.

He was followed by the dynamic Halifax organiser Richard Mulhall, who spoke of the vital role of local community politics initiatives in building the solid support at ward level which is essential to establishing the BNP as a credible contender for council seats. His description of the advances made in Halifax in this field was both heartening and instructive.

An excellent collection boosted the total raised towards the Euro-Fund in the previous six weeks to nearly £1,500. Particular thanks in this regard must go to the member who, despite being unemployed, cleaned out his savings in order to contribute no less than £400! Not content with that, he also gave the local party a transit van, which will be fitted with a loudspeaker and posters to bring the BNP message to various parts of the North East during the election. Talk about commitment!

Although the party will not be able to afford blanket leaflet coverage in the region, households in about ten entire parliamentary constituencies will receive the British National Party election address. High unemployment, low wages and dissatisfaction with New Labour's old Tory policies are beginning to make many parts of the North East potentially fertile ground for the party. This vast distribution of publicity material will help to raise the BNP's profile and further increase recruitment.

The monthly bulletin which is now being produced will help to keep newcomers informed and in touch, and another local leaflet, on an issue which is sure to grab the headlines, will be out soon. Watch this space!

ON March 8 you published an article, Ugly face of the enemy within, by Jennifer Cunningham, which focused on the violent neo-Nazi group Combat 18.

Unfortunately, while exposing this gang, she falsely claimed that they were founded by the British National Party, which is complete nonsense. The BNP is a legitimate law-abiding political party committed to the democratic process and to freedom of speech for all.

From what we can gather, Combat 18 was either a honey trap orchestrated by the State from the beginning, as claimed by the World in Action programme some time ago and mentioned briefly in the article, or else set up by an American named Harold Covington as claimed in some other press reports. Either way, it was not founded by the BNP. We had our own stewarding team for meetings at the time which is still in use today, organised then and now by Ian Dell, who has never been a member of Combat 18.

The BNP has always condemned Combat 18's tactics and has at times been the victim of these violent tactics. Our chairman, John Tyndall, and other officials have proscribed them publicly on a number of occasions.

The BNP are dedicated to achieving our aims through the ballot box as will be demonstrated by the BNP contesting Scotland and England with a full complement of candidates at the forthcoming European Elections in June.

Writing BNP letters to the press may sometimes seem a thankless task, but it pays to persevere. After the non-appearance of several recent letters, Scottish Secretary Kenneth Smith hit the jackpot last month with this one, complete with address, in the Sunday Herald.

ENFIELD BACK

After a gap of some months following the untimely death of Dave Bruce, Enfield and Herts BNP held a relaunch meeting on April 3rd. 25 members and supporters attended the meeting, which was ably chaired by Ray Johns.

North and East London regional organiser Tony Lecomber gave a short talk on what was involved in the coming big election contest, after which the chairman introduced the evening's main speaker, Nick Griffin.

Mr. Griffin spoke of the huge opportunities now opening up for British nationalism, explaining in particular how various aspects of the European superstate project, such as the proposed unified European legal system and single currency, are both deadly threats to our national freedom and things likely to spark a massive popular backlash once their disastrous impact begins to be felt.

DIESEL PROTEST

Members of the London Instant Response Group attended the lorry-drivers' and cabbies' protest against vehicle and fuel tax increases, which brought much of Central London to a standstill on 12th April.

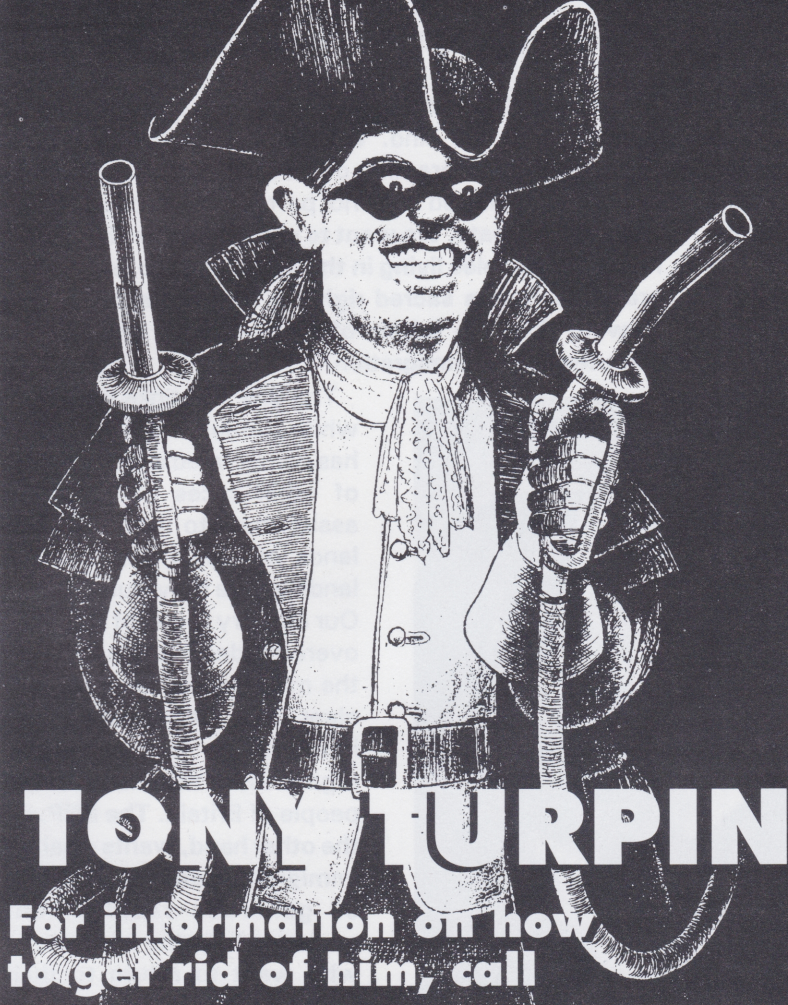

Six members took time off work to form a small team which was very well received by the protesters. One taxi driver promptly put the leaflet up in the window of his black cab, and an enthusiastic lorry driver said that he was going to get the 'Tony Turpin' design painted on the side of his truck!

BNP activists also used copies of the leaflet at the simultaneous protests in Plymouth, but the party's presence in London attracted the biggest attention. Not only did it get an impartial mention in the next day's Independent, but a copy produced a useful and quite amusing piece of publicity on BBC Greater London Radio. Asked if the leaflet's reference to 'bogus refugees' and to 'hardworking people being bled white' was "a thinly-veiled racial onslaught," former Tory Transport Minister Stephen Norris remarked:--

"No no, I think it's fair. First of all, 'to be bled white' is a perfectly legitimate English aphorism. You're probably absolutely right that it's not there on the leaflet by accident, but it's clearly not unacceptable by itself, and to call refugees occasionally 'bogus', well that's to mirror words the Home Secretary Jack Straw has used, as did his predecessor Michael Howard before him.

"But what's so interesting about the BNP (is that) they have tried very hard to hold back on what we know them to be, and are trying to package themselves in a way which makes them sound frightfully reasonable and on the side of truck drivers, farmers, taxi-drivers, fishermen and other decent, hard-working British people. And personally I think that is a very clever trick, but I doubt if it's going to con many people."

YORKSHIRE UNITY

THE start of the month saw a very useful meeting in Leeds. In addition to local supporters, this was also attended by officials and key activists from Dewsbury, Bradford, Halifax and Harrogate.

All agreed that it is essential that all the units in Yorkshire work closely together during and after the Euros, and that the presence of Dave Mitchell as Yorkshire Co-ordinator will help in this. With some one-and-a-half million leaflets going out in the region, close co-operation on follow-ups is vital.

In addition to a speech by Eddie Morrison, the meeting heard a report from Halifax organiser Richard Mulhall, whose account of the campaign being waged by the unit's five local election candidates showed that the tactics of in-depth community politics and serious electoral effort are really starting to take root in the BNP in Yorkshire.

SCOTTISH PROGRESS

YORKSHIRE'S Tony MacDonnell was in action again a few days later, speaking at an enthusiastic meeting in Dundee, which marked the start of the party's Euro campaign in Scotland. More than fifty members and supporters attended, generating an atmosphere of great excitement at the beginning of the largest publicity drive in the history of the Scottish BNP. A great collection took the total raised in Scotland towards the party's Euro-fund to £5,150.

The party's eight Euro-election candidates were announced as Scott MacLean (Scottish and Glasgow organiser); Kenneth Smith (Scottish secretary); Russell Bradley (Tayside organiser); Paul Wilkinson (Argyll organiser); Robert Currie (who also stood for the party in the last general election); Mark Allen (Tayside activist), and Glasgow and Edinburgh branch activists David Kerr and Gordon Espin.

The BNP is not a racist party

We are British — proud of being British and of our native genius. DNA studies at Oxford University, published last year, showed that 99 per cent of us whose grandparents were born here are directly related to the people who lived in these islands more than 10,000 years ago. The majority go back even further — 40,000 years. We were made by this land, and we shaped it in turn! The same studies prove that the genetic differences between the English, Welsh, Scots and Irish are negligible; we are proud of our different cultures, but we are the same people. So much for the politically correct lie about the British being a 'mongrel race'!

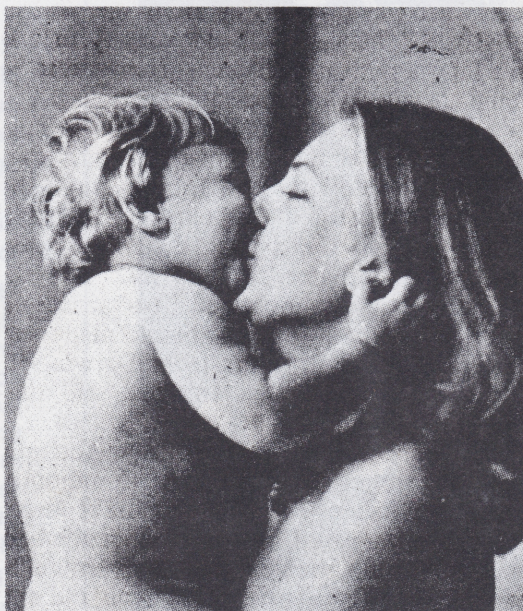

Like people everywhere, black and white alike, we want future generations who spring from us to live on within our homeland, and to be like ourselves. It isn't a matter of 'hate', we simply want our grandchildren to look like our grandparents, and to be moved by the same things.

We respect that wish among other peoples throughout the world, and support their right to preserve their own identities and freedom in their own countries. All we ask is that the British people should have the same right. This is our homeland, and we have no other.

Suppose what is happening in Britain were happening in a small black country: unlimited immigration without the democratic consent of its people; the systematic suppression of the natives' cultural inheritance; the destruction of freedom of speech; the mass media demonisation of anyone who speaks out about these things. Those who accuse the BNP of 'racism' for opposing those evils here would adopt a very different position. They would speak of colonialism, imperialism, and racism against the host people — and they would be right!

What is called 'racism' on the BNP's part by the media is nothing of the kind. We are simply resisting what amounts to a programme of slow genocide against our race. Racial hatred has no part in the world we are working to create. We want to see a rainbow of different races and peoples living in the homelands to which they are entitled as a sacred right. Is that not a saner way forward than the Britain of racial attacks and endless disputes about immigration?

The BNP has links with non-white groups elsewhere, and has co-operated with members of other races in Britain to assist them to return to their lands of ethnic origin — the lands where they truly belong. Our country is one of the most overcrowded in the world, yet the main parties have made it clear that permanent mass immigration is our future, regardless of the wishes of the people of Britain. The BNP, on the other hand, wants a halt to immigration, and the provision of generous resettlement grants to help the immigrants who want to return to their own homelands.

The main parties and the media have used their endless false accusations of 'racism' to create an atmosphere of fear among Britons about speaking out on these issues. We are going to end this oppression.

Standing up for the rights of your fellow Britons, and the survival of our culture and identity, is nothing to be ashamed of. It is morally right, and what other peoples do throughout the world. It's right — and it's what you do when you join the British National Party.

Help the British National Party to reach 30 million Britons in the coming European Elections with our message of hope for the new century. Organising a political response to anti-white racism is the only way to reverse the juggernaut of political correctness which is crushing the British people into second class status in our own land.
